THE following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved February 6, 1864:

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel; and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo, shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the net proceeds of her outward cargo, and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved, March 16, 1864.
(Signed) C. G. MEMMINGER, Secretary of Treasury.
(Signed) JAMES A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.

Approved, March 17, 1864.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits, or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries,' approved May 21, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:—All things for medical purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castille, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval service.

SEC. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; muffs and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, or of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, bedsides, and other portions of carpeting, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cider and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds; fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other floor matting and mats made of flags, jute, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread laciugs and insertings; velvets of all kinds

SEC. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges; cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, mosaics, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery; leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E. Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

SEC. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to articles of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

SEC. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. If any article or articles the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

SEC. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to forfeiture by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate States after said first day of March next, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

SEC. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.'

SEC. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;' and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned.'

SEC. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

Approved, February 6, 1864.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THAT which was dimly foreshadowed last week is now a matter of history. General Grant's original plan of campaign has failed. After having not less than 70,000 of his men killed and wounded, he has had to abandon the direct road to Richmond. The Confederate positions at Spottsylvania and on the South Anna were too strong for him, and therefore he made a change of base and moved to Hanover Town, a place about twelve miles from Richmond. General Lee made the necessary counter-movements, and the Federal commander found, on arriving at his new position, the Confederate army formidably entrenched and confronting him. Several days were spent in preparation, and on June 1 the Confederate right wing was unsuccessfully assaulted. It appears, from the very meagre account of this affair, that it was intended as the prelude to a general attack, but the design was foiled. Again there was a pause until the morning of the 3rd, when there was another assault. From the official reports, which admit that the Federals gained no decisive advantage, and that they lost 3,000 in killed and wounded, we learn that Grant's attempt was a failure, and that he could make no impression on the Confederate lines. Such is the substance of the intelligence that the Federal Government has published. The principal points of the recent news are these:—

1. Grant has failed in his original plan of campaign.

2. He is now in a place about twelve miles from Richmond, which he might have reached weeks ago without any loss. Two years ago M'Clellan led his army as near to Richmond with little fighting and trifling losses. Therefore Grant's change of base is a confession of failure, and that the 70,000 killed and wounded were vainly sacrificed.

3. Grant found the Confederate position on the South Anna too formidable for assault, and he now has to deal with the Confederate army in a position not less but even more strongly fortified.

4. Two assaults on the present Confederate lines have been repulsed.

These are nearly all the important and reliable facts to be gleaned from the Federal reports, and they are sufficient, we think, to explain why, in spite of the most vigorous efforts on the part of Mr. Chase, the price of gold in New York has further advanced, and on June 4 was quoted at 92 per cent. premium.

A PART of Butler's forces have been sent to reinforce Grant. This will not alter the odds, for a further portion of Beauregard's forces have joined Lee. Butler, not being able to keep his promise of getting into Richmond, and instead of being the assailant having to act on the defensive, has been trying to help the Administration by sending a sensational despatch to Mr. Stanton, in which he announced that 'Grant was driving Lee,' and that a female deserter—we presume one of the reliable contrabands—had informed him that a meeting had been held in Richmond to consider whether the city should be burnt or surrendered, and that the mayor was put in Castle Thunder for proposing surrender!

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Herald with Butler's army writes that the Confederates 'are erecting some new batteries on the south side of the James River, which, it is thought, the Monitors will not be able to reach. It is believed these batteries will reach our right, and be able to operate on our works.'

THE term of service of a regiment under Butler, at Bermuda Hundred, expired on May 22. Butler urged the men to re-enlist for three months, offering them a bounty of $10 per month for that time. The men refused to accede to his terms, and insisted upon being sent home.

ON June 1, a Confederate ironclad attacked the Federal Monitors at Bermuda Hundred, and after a two hours' fight returned to Richmond. No details are given: hence we may conclude that the Federals did not get the best of the encounter.

ALTHOUGH at this distance it is difficult to anticipate the movements in Virginia, those on the spot are able to do so with great accuracy. Grant's change of base was anticipated for days before it took place. The Baltimore correspondent of the New York World wrote as follows on May 27: 'But it is said that General Lee does not believe that Grant will attack him on the South Anna, but will, instead, move his army to Hanover Court House, south of the Pamunkey, and so, by flanking him, approach Richmond from the North. General Lee believes that the Union commander will be forced to do this from the question of supplies alone. Even in its present position, say at Chesterfield, north of the North Anna river, the mode of supplying the army with food, &c., is attended with great difficulty and danger. The distance from that point to Belle Plain, or even to Fredericksburg, is thirty miles. If our army follows Lee to his line on the South Anna, it will be infinitely worse. The distance from our base of supplies will then be forty miles, entirely through a hostile country, affording every possible opportunity for the interception and capture of our supply trains. General Lee believes that these considerations will lead General Grant to seek at Hanover, or at some point a few miles below that, on the Pamunkey, a water base for his supplies.'

THE movements of General Sherman are causing an uneasy feeling in the North, and this feeling was intensified by a report in Richmond papers that on May 28 the contending armies fought, and that the Federals were defeated with a loss of from 5,000 to 7,000 men. According to the Richmond Examiner, it was Howard's division which suffered on this occasion.

Two Federal gunboats, the Granite City and the Wave, were sent to Sabine Pass, in order to capture some schooners supposed to be laden with cotton. The Confederates, under cover of darkness, brought up two pieces of artillery, and notified their presence to the enemy by opening a fire which in a short time so crippled the Granite City and the Wave, that both vessels surrendered with their crews.—Our Texas correspondent refers to this affair.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Herald gives a graphic account of the way in which the Harriet Lane, accompanied by three other vessels loaded with cotton, eluded the Yankee blockade off Galveston, on April 30. He writes: 'It is with regret that I have to announce the escape of the late United States revenue cutter, Harriet Lane, in company with three other notorious blockade-running steamers — viz. Matagorda, alias Alice, Isabel, and one whose name is unknown—from the harbour of Galveston. After being so closely watched for the past fifteen months, her escape, in company with the other steamers, was effected on the night of the 30th ult., during a squall, in this wise:—During the day the weather was dull and cloudy throughout, and the night set in dark and squally, with occasional quick flashes of lightning, at which time it was difficult to see anything, even at a short distance. The Harriet Lane, with a schooner in tow, followed by the Matagorda and Isabel, at intervals of fifteen minutes, left her moorings off Pelican Spit Fort—behind which the Lane and all blockade-runners to Galveston are protected, and laden with cotton—about half-past eight o'clock in the evening, and steamed slowly along the land to the southward and westward in the south-west channel, keeping close in to the island, to elude detection by our blockading vessels. To deceive our forces, the rebels, a few days previously, had planted buoys in the north-east or Bolivar channel, to give us the impression they were to run out that passage. Therefore, on the night in question, apprehending their attempt to escape, additional blockading vessels were placed in that channel, and only one in the south-west channel, which was deemed too shallow for the Lane to run through, as by the chart not more than eight feet of water can be obtained therein. By information received from deserters, the Lane, when loaded, drew ten or eleven feet.' But despite the information of 'deserters,' the Harriet Lane and her companions went out by the south-west channel, and, though chased by the Federal gunboat Katahdin, got safely off.

THE Federals have had two other naval disasters. Some of their torpedoes exploded accidentally at Bachelor's Creek, North Carolina, and killed and wounded 70 soldiers. The Federal transport Pocahontas was sunk on the 1st inst. by coming into collision off Cape May with another transport. Her passengers and crew were lost.

WE stated some time past that the Confederate Government had sent a commissioner to Halifax for the purpose of investigating the facts in the case of the seizure of the United States merchant steamer Chesapeake, and we gave at some length the principles of international law upon which the Government was prepared to assume the responsibility of the act and base a claim for the restitution of the vessel. We are now able to add that, upon the report of its commissioner, the Confederate Government, placed in full possession of the facts, has decided that these principles are not applicable to the Chesapeake, and, so far from forming the basis of a future demand against the British Government, the act of the captors is distinctly and formally disavowed. The judicial authorities of the colony have, we believe, been unofficially informed of this conclusion. The position assumed by the Confederate Government we understand to be this. While it maintains, and will continue to maintain, the right and the duty of every citizen of the Confederate States, and every foreigner enlisted in their service, to wage warfare openly or by stratagem upon the vessels of their enemy on the high seas, whether armed or not, it will afford no countenance or encouragement, whether direct or indirect, to any attempts on the part of neutral subjects, or within neutral jurisdictions, to organise expeditions for the purpose of carrying on hostilities against the United States.

WE publish a correspondence between Mr. Seward and Mr. Dayton, respecting the Monroe resolution in the Federal House of Representatives. Some Northern papers intimate that Mr. Seward has suppressed an important despatch. The Federal House of Representatives is not satisfied, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs declare that Congress alone has power to dictate the policy to be pursued in such cases, and have instructed the chairman, Mr. Winter Davis, to prepare a report to that effect, to be accompanied by a resolution reiterating the previously expressed determination in regard to a monarchy in Mexico.

WE elsewhere publish a communication addressed to the Confederate Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury. In order to avoid an inflation of the currency, Mr. Memminger proposes that the purchases of the Government shall be paid for by certificates of indebtedness, payable two years after peace in specie, and interest in the meantime to be paid semi-annually in specie or its market value in Confederate notes. He also proposes that the articles purchased by the Government shall be rated at the prices of 1860, when the currency was at a specie standard. He also recommends that the Treasury should be authorised to purchase and ship as much cotton as will realise sufficient coin to pay the interest on the certificates.

ON May 30, in the Federal House of Representatives, Mr. Lazear, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution:—'That the President be required to adopt measures for the suspension of hostilities between the North and South, and an armistice, in order that in the meantime a convention may be called of all the States, with a view to the restoration of the Union, with their constitutional rights.' The resolution was objected to as being out of order. Whilst Mr. Lazear was moving a suspension of the rules, the House adjourned without coming to a vote.

A CONVENTION for the nomination of a President and Vice-President of the United States was opened at Cleveland, Ohio, on May 31. The object of this gathering was to forestall the Baltimore Convention, at which Mr. Lincoln was to be nominated. General Cochrane of New York was chosen to preside over the Convention, and in the course of his inaugural address protested against the violation of the rights and liberties of the citizens, declared that the right of asylum ignored in the case of Colonel Arguelles must be maintained, and concluded by defending the Monroe doctrine, and said: 'When we have got through with the rebellion, as we shall soon do, we will prove to the world that we have still left to us will and vigour enough to preserve the American continent free from the polluting tread of the myrmidons of foreign Powers.' This part of General Cochrane's speech was vehemently cheered. A platform of thirteen resolutions was agreed upon. It advocates the preservation of the Federal Union and confiscation of the lands of the South, and it desires that the Constitution of the United States shall be observed, and yet that the Constitution shall be amended. It declares slavery to be destroyed; proposes to amend the Constitution, so that the President and Vice-President shall be elected by the direct vote of the people, and that a President should be ineligible for reelection. We subjoin the eighth, third, and thirteenth resolutions:—

Eighth. That the national policy known as the 'Monroe doctrine' has become a recognised principle, and that the establishment of anti-republican government on this continent by any foreign Power cannot be tolerated.

Third. That the rebellion must be suppressed by force of arms, and without compromise.

Thirteenth. That the confiscation of the lands of the rebels, and their distribution among the soldiers and actual settlers, is a measure of justice.

General Fremont was nominated for the Presidency by acclamation. For Vice-President Generals Butler and Cochrane were proposed, and the latter was nominated.

Mr. Wendell Phillips addressed a letter to the Convention, in which he protested against the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, for in that case, 'unless the South is recognised, the war will continue.' Mr. Phillips was for Fremont or Butler. He wrote: 'Fremont is my first choice, but I can support either of them.'

The Cleveland platform and nomination is supported by the Germans, who held a meeting on May 29, at which they passed the following resolution:—

Upholding the Monroe doctrine at all hazards is a vital question for the Republic. The most effective remedy to prevent monarchical invasions consists in promoting the efforts of European nations for liberty, who have the same interest in America securing the institution and the palladium of liberty as America has in liberating Europe.

MR. CHASE'S operations are peculiar. Being pressed for money, he announces a loan for $75,000,000, 6 per cent. interest payable in coin, and the principal redeemable on June 30, 1881. He has also raised the rate on temporary deposits to 6 per cent. On the other hand, to keep down the price of gold, he announces that he is ready to pay at once the interest due on July 1, and sells half a million sterling of the surplus Treasury gold. But though Mr. Chase has no doubt kept gold lower than it would have been if he had not operated on the market, he could not prevent a steady rise, and on June 4 it was quoted in New York at 92 per cent. premium.

GENERALS Banks, Rosecrans, and Steele are placed under the orders of General Canby as division commanders. Commenting on this, the New Orleans papers assure their readers that 'there is nothing humiliating in the present position of General Banks.'

THE Captain-General of Cuba announces the arrival of Colonel Arguelles at Havana, in the custody of Spanish officials.

WE publish this week the first letter from our Texas correspondent. It gives a lucid and interesting account of Banks's late campaign.

ENGLAND.

WE publish elsewhere a copy of instructions furnished to Colonial Governors on the subject of belligerent cruisers by the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell, the new Secretary of State for the Colonies. They are worthy of a careful perusal, appear to be founded on principles of reason and justice, and indicate a policy entirely opposed to that of the rules issued by the former Secretary of State, the Duke of Newcastle.

THE Channel Fleet arrived on Tuesday last at Spithead from Plymouth Sound. It now lies anchored in two lines, the weather-line being composed of the Edgar 71, Warrior 40, and Black Prince 40. The lee-line is composed of the Hector 34, Defence 16, and Prince Consort 35. The Trinculo gunboat is anchored inshore of the fleet. All these vessels, except the Edgar and Trinculo, are iron-cased frigates. The fleet possesses a collective force of 237 guns, a tonnage of 26,985, and engine horse-power of 5,500 nominal. It is under the command of Rear-Admiral of the Red Sydney Colpoys Dacres, C.B. A few weeks or even days will decide the question whether the fleet will proceed to the Baltic.

THE Conference on the Danish question was to have sat yesterday, but the meeting was adjourned to this day.

A REVIEW, equally worthy to be studied by military critics and to be admired by the sight-seeing public, was held at Chatham on Saturday last. The review took the character of a great siege assault delivered both by land and water. For months past on the flank of the works on St. Mary's Creek, the first, second, and third parallels had been constructed with all the care and precision which would have been employed had the attack been of a real character. Of course the besieged on their side had driven their mines under the enemy's advanced works, had sunk torpedoes worthy of Charleston and Beauregard in St. Mary's Creek, and had constructed a boom across it. The garrison consisted of men of the marine artillery; the besiegers were marines and royal engineers. The assault commenced at three o'clock. At that hour the boom was blown up by way of signal, and at once from all the works the firing of the guns mingled with the rattling of the musketry was heard. The garrison replied with vigour, the men standing well to their guns, and the riflemen firing with great rapidity from the line of the parapet. Soon the boats from the huge men-of-war took up positions in the creek so as to enfilade the defences, and kept up a furious discharge of shells. Next the besieged sprang their two mines, and, having thereby dislodged the enemy by land, proceeded to fire their torpedoes. These instruments, six in number, had been sunk for a week in thirty feet of water, but all exploded with success, throwing great columns of water high into the air. The charges in them varied from 100 to 160 lbs. At length the artillery of the besiegers ceased firing, and on the left and centre the assaulting columns hurried across the open with their scaling ladders. The parapet was carried with a rush, and then the men found themselves in front of a brick fosse, thirty feet deep and fifty feet wide. Thereupon a party of sappers covered by an active discharge of musketry crept round the edge of the ditch with guy ropes and hauled a single-legged 'turtle' into the centre of the fosse, using which as their centre pin, they constructed with great speed a Birogah bridge. Across this the columns dashed and were followed by some guns. The besieged retired behind a strong palisade, where they maintained themselves until driven out by the guns. They then fell back closely pursued into Prince Edward's Bastion, where they surrendered. On the centre a gallant attempt was made to prevent the besiegers from landing, and when these last had got a footing in the works, the great mine was sprung, and a rush made through the breach; after which, the garrison was driven in a running fight into the Cumberland Bastion and surrendered. At the close of the fight the troops marched past.

ACCORDING to a Parliamentary return it appears that the receipts of the Patriotic Fund, collected for the widows and orphans of the men who fell in the Crimea, have reached the sum of 1,459,697*l.* Up to the end of 1862, 551,091*l.* had been expended in relief. The number of widows of non-commissioned officers and men placed on the list was 3,508, and of children 4,581; there were also 135 officers' widows and 230 officers' children in receipt of allowances. The Commissioners have authorised an addition to the allowances to widows with children, and the erection of a chapel for the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum. The liabilities for the continuance of relief are exceeded by the assets. Last year the Commissioners received 1,766*l.* on account, from the trustee of the will of F. Rodriguez, a Philippine Spaniard, who, dying without kindred, has left his property for the succour of families of English subjects killed in war.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST, M.P. for the Northern Division of the county of Durham, died on Sunday last. He was the second son of the late Marquis of Londonderry, by his second wife, Frances Anne, the only daughter and heiress of Sir H. Vane-Tempest. He entered the Scots Fusilier Guards in 1843, and was present at the siege of Sebastopol. He married, in 1860, Lady Susan Pelham Clinton, only daughter of the Duke of Newcastle.

LADY GRENVILLE, the only daughter of the First Lord Camelford, died on Monday last, in London. She was born in 1772, and in 1792 married Lord Grenville. She was the sister of that son of Lord Camelford who figures in the memoirs of Lady Hester Stanhope, and was shot by Captain Best. The large estates enjoyed by Her Ladyship go to the Hon. George Fortescue, uncle of the present Earl.

THE University of Oxford, although not honoured by the presence of Royalty, celebrated its commemoration last week with accustomed gaiety and splendour. Balls, boat processions, and flower shows charmed the visitors. No men of mark received honorary degrees, with the exception of M. Thierry and Sir Rowland Hill, but the doings in the famous Sheldonian Theatre were by no means devoid of life and interest. The political cries were more vehement, the personal attacks more fierce, and the spirit of applause or reprobation more strongly developed, if possible, than is usually the case. One of the Proctors was evidently the object of intense animosity, and the uproar at his appearance was terrific. Professor Jowett was lustily cheered, so also was Lord Derby. Mr. Bright's name was the signal for groans and hisses; Mr. Gladstone divided the multitude into foes and friends. Denmark was cheered, and groans were called for Prussia and Austria. 'The South' received most flattering applause, and a Confederate officer in uniform was discovered on the floor of the theatre, and enjoyed a perfect ovation.

THE annual cricket match between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was played at Lord's Ground on Monday and Tuesday. Oxford proved victorious by four wickets. Cambridge obtained 75 runs in the first innings, and 136 runs in the second innings. Oxford obtained 87 runs in the first innings. In the second innings of Oxford, Mr. Mitchell, formerly of Eton celebrity, scored 55 runs. The play on both sides was admirable.

THE yearling thoroughbred colts and fillies reared by Mr. Blenkiron at his stud farm, Middle Park, in Kent, were sold by auction on Saturday last. Forty-three animals were offered for competition. The most renowned of the sires were Dundee, Fandango, Windhound, Wild Dayrell, the Flying Dutchman, Idle Boy, Marsyas, and Lord of the Isles. The highest price was obtained for a colt by the Flying Dutchman out of Magic by Melbourne, who was knocked down for 810 guineas. A filly by Dundee out of the Belle by Birdcatcher, fetched 800 guineas, and a colt by Dundee out of Defenceless, the dam of the great Caractacus, fetched 700 guineas. The whole forty-three animals produced the gross sum of 11,855 guineas, or an average of about 276 guineas each.

THE summer meeting at Ascot, in the beauty of the weather, the number and fashion of the company, and the excellence of the sport, fully sustained its prestige. On Tuesday, June 7, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince Alfred, Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, were present. The first race of importance was that for the Gold Vase given by Her Majesty, which was won by Young Rapid, a rank outsider of mere plating pretensions, who managed to defeat with ease good horses, such as Fairwater, Wingrave, The Little Stag, Johnny Armstrong, and Caller Ou, who finished in the order named. The Little Stag had been made the favourite at the odds of 7 to 4, and the utmost confidence in him was entertained by Lord St. Vincent; but the horse made all the running, and galloped himself to a standstill. Young Rapid is the property of the Hon. G. Craven. The Prince of Wales Stake (value 1,960*l.*) was won by Mr. Cartwright's Ely, a son of Kingston; Count de Lagrange being second with Fille de l'Air, and the Knight of Snowdon finishing third. Fille de l'Air had been raced on the Sunday previously at Paris for the Grand Prix. Consequently only about 48 hours had elapsed, in which period of time she was expected not only to recover her powers after a most severe struggle, but also to sustain the fatigues of a journey by sea and land of about 400 miles. Under these circumstances, it was almost a pleasure to the general public to see her owner disappointed in his expectation of victory, the only regret being that so good a mare should be subjected to such treatment. On Wednesday, the Royal Hunt Cup, with its 92 subscribers of 10*l.* each, brought 33 horses to the post; the winner turning up in Mr. Longfield's Gem of the Sea, by Gemma di Vergy—Mr. Merry's Crisis being second, and Baron Rothschild's Evelina third. Mr. Longfield hails from the sister island, and is the owner of the famous horses Union Jack, Blarney, and Caroline. Thursday was chiefly remarkable for the extraordinary achievements of Mr. Merry's stable. Out of the eight races contested, that distinguished sportsman won no less than four. The First New Biennial Stakes were won by his horse Scottish Chief, defeating Knight of Snowdon, Blue Mantle, Master Richard, and Young Rapid. Scottish Chief, it will be recollected, ran third for the Derby. He is by Lord of the Isles out of Miss Ann, and he won this same race last year. Next Mr. Merry won the Second Biennial Stakes with a two-year old colt called Zambesi, by Saunterer out of Margaret of Anjou, who deserves a passing notice. He was purchased as a yearling for 930 guineas. His colour is black; he is very compact, and has a beautiful forehand. He would, indeed, be perfect if he had a little more length. At Ascot he was quite fat, and yet defeated in gallant style a field of twelve horses of some pretensions. Mr. Merry also won the New Stakes with Liddington, a two-year old colt by Orlando out of Lady Roden by West Australian, a fine well-grown animal in perfect condition; but with a plain head and not the best of legs. This colt also won a race on the preceding Tuesday, and by these two performances he has been elevated to the position of first favourite for the Derby of 1865 at the very short price of 6 to 1. That he is a good horse cannot be doubted; but that, with such legs and with Orlando for his sire, he should be backed now at the price which, if he remains well and free from accident, will probably be his price in the month of May 1865, on Epsom Downs, seems to prove that the gentlemen of the turf are gifted with very sanguine temperaments. His stable companion, Zambesi, is a sounder and in our opinion at least as fast a horse, and yet he finds favour only at the odds of 25 to 1. To complete her work, Fortune also presented Mr. Merry with the Ascot Gold Cup, which was won with much ease by Scottish Chief, the Little Stag being second, and the Duke of Beaufort's Lord Zetland being third. The renowned Lord Clifden also started, but his condition was such as to shut out all hopes of victory for the horse whom Lord St. Vincent perhaps correctly holds to be the best animal of the day. On Friday, Blair Athol, the winner of the Derby, and the unsuccessful competitor of Vermuth in the Grand Prix at Paris, appeared at Ascot, and galloped away with the Eleventh Triennial Stakes, defeating Ely by a length and a half. The running of Ely at Ascot goes indeed to show that he did not do himself justice at Epsom. It will be recollected that he was nowhere in the Derby. At Ascot, however, he gave Knight of Snowdon in the Prince of Wales Stakes 12 lbs., and beat him in a canter by four lengths. Scottish Chief gave this same Knight of Snowdon 14 lbs., and beat him only by a neck. Therefore, Ely at Ascot would have beaten Scottish Chief at even weights. Similarly Blair Athol at Ascot defeated Ely by a length and a half, but at Epsom he defeated Scottish Chief by at least four lengths. In the four days at Ascot thirty-five races in all were decided, and in many of the contests large fields came to the post.

IRELAND.

THE agent of Colonel Fulke Greville, of the county of Westmeath, issued some few weeks since an order to the tenants on Colonel Greville's estates against cutting turf or peat in Caddagh Bog. Mr. Morris, the agent, immediately received a threatening letter signed 'Your Coffin,' and intimating that, if the order was not withdrawn, a dose of lead would settle the matter. Colonel Greville at once published an address, stating that he could not parley with assassins, nor suffer the life of one who had served him faithfully to be placed in jeopardy without taking the strongest measures to afford him that protection which unfortunately the laws of the land were inadequate to give. He therefore gave notice that if a hair of the head of Mr. Morris was touched he was resolved to evict every family on the townland of Caddagh, and to level their houses with the ground. This address of Colonel Greville, a firm supporter of tenant-right, has caused great excitement in a section of the Irish press.

A CORRESPONDENCE of an interesting character has passed between the chief secretary for Ireland and Admiral the Hon. H. Rous, on the subject of the deterioration in the breed of horses in the modern Epirus. Sir Robert Peel points to the carelessness alleged to exist with regard to the preservation of brood mares, to the dearth of good stallions, to the complaint that the Queen's Plates are all won by English horses, and to the mischiefs arising from the system of handicaps; and alludes to the arguments urged in favour of the restoration of four-mile heats, with weights of 140 lbs., as an inducement to rear horses of size and substance. He records how, in the time of Sir William Temple, the Lord-Lieutenant attended at the races to decide all controversies, and how the jockeys rode from the field with the Viceroy, and dined with him on that day. Sir Robert then states that the Government has the power to dispose of 1,600*l.* in Queen's Plates in Ireland, according to regulations which it may see fit to impose; and he asks whether the Admiral would wish to limit the entries to Irish horses. The answer of Admiral Rous is in every way just and decisive. As to the alleged deterioration, he says that if the Irish gentlemen sell every first-class stallion, every superior mare, and every promising young horse, it is not surprising that they are unable to compete with the English owners. No country, says the Admiral, can compete with the limestone pasturage of Ireland for breeding horses. Thence come the best heavy-weight hunters, bought up at two or three years old by the English and foreign dealers. At the last national steeple-chase in England, five out of the first seven horses were Irish. Last year Union Jack and Blarney, the two best two-year-olds, hailed from the sister island. As to Government encouragement, the Irish paid no racehorse tax and received 1681*l.* per annum in Plates. In England the Government gave 3465*l.* for Plates, and exacted 7126*l.* by way of tax on racehorses, the national encouragement being, therefore, 3661*l.* to the bad. The Admiral would keep the Irish Plates open to the world, but observes that no man would send a horse worth 600*l.* across the water for those paltry prizes. As to the weights and heats proposed, no sane man would run a horse worth 3,000*l.* four miles for 100*l.* Indeed, it is clear that a racehorse who can run three miles is worth 3,000*l.*, and the value of a half-mile horse is 100*l.* Handicapping may be an inducement to fraud and gambling, but it is incorporated into the racing system, it keeps numerous horses in training, it gives wages and employment to thousands, and amusements to the million, while it augments the value of horses. The Admiral finally asks for a national prize of 5,000*l.* to be run for by four-year-olds and upwards, three miles. Interference and restrictions he condemns as ungenerous to the turf, to trade, and to commerce.

AUSTRALIA.

The 'Dick Turpin' of Australia has been captured. Francis Gardiner had long been the terror of a wide district in the State of New South Wales, but his name was associated with stories of romantic courtesy, scarcely excelled by the deeds of Claude Duval, the ci-devant valet, who in one of his wild adventures plundered the coach of a fair lady of rank, and compelled the haughty dame to dance a coranto with him on the heath. Gardiner even mixed in good society, had an exquisite ear for music, and would sing the most pathetic songs while plotting the pillage of the mansion. For horses he had a fondness that would not be denied, and his stud was continually replenished with the choicest animals drawn from the stables of great landed proprietors. At last a reward of 1,000*l.* was put upon his head, and his capture was effected by a surprise admirably conceived and boldly executed. The captor was formerly an officer in the Light Division, one who had fought in the storming of the Redan, and who, in the absence of the 'gaudia certaminis, had sought excitement as the hunter of the modern 'Moss-troopers.'

The Destruction of Washington, North Carolina.—The Federal General Palmer, commanding at Newbern, North Carolina, published an order to his troops on May 3, in which he severely rebukes them for their Vandalism during the late evacuation of Washington, North Carolina. He says, 'That town was fired and nearly, if not entirely, consumed, thus wantonly rendering houseless and homeless hundreds of poor women and children. . . . . It is also well known that the army Vandals did not even respect the charitable institutions, but, breaking open the doors of the Masonic and Odd-Fellows' Lodges, pillaged them both, and hawked about the streets the regalia and jewels. And this, too, by United States troops. It is well known, too, that both public and private stores were entered and plundered, and that devastation and destruction ruled the hour.' General Palmer orders this to be read to every regiment, and implies the guilt of the Seventeenth Massachusetts Volunteers and the Fifteenth Connecticut Volunteers by ordering it to be read to their regiments for ten consecutive days.

Advice to Liverpool Shipowners.—The New York Herald of May 31 thus concludes an article on the petition lately presented to Parliament by some shipowners of Liverpool:—'If the persons whose names are signed to this memorial—and they are very influential—would avert the consequences of the acts which inspire them with such well-founded apprehension, they should call upon Parliament to vote compensation to our shipowners for the losses inflicted upon them, amounting now to upwards of $30,000,000. It will have to do it sooner or later, and it may as well do it spontaneously and at once. That is the only way in which the memories of past injuries can be blotted out and immunity from retaliation be secured. Of its effect upon British interests, should we be forced to resort to it, we will say nothing at present. The Liverpool shipowners have so lively an appreciation of it that it is unnecessary for us to intensify their fears.'

The Northern Policy.—The Chicago Journal reports a conversation between a Ju'ge of Tennessee and a Federal officer. The former asked if it would not be better to put a stop to pillage, some saying that some Union men suffered from it. The officer replied, 'No, sir; no, sir; the policy is to leave the country a desert, and then, if the rebels want it, let them have it'

Federal Marine Losses.—We learn from the New York World that from January 1 of the present year to May 31, two hundred and three Yankee merchant vessels were captured, lost, and missing, and that the value of the vessels and their cargoes is estimated at $9,311,850.

THE CONTINENT.

THE CONFERENCE.

A meeting of the Conference for the settlement of the Danish difficulty took place on Thursday, the 9th instant, and a further suspension of hostilities was agreed upon, to last for a fortnight from the expiration of the former truce on the 12th. Considering the various solutions which have been proposed for the difficulties before the Conference, and the perplexing manner in which the arguments in favour of each solution are interwoven, it may be as well to methodise, as far as possible, the present position of affairs in our minds. The question to which an answer is sought is simply this: What is to be the ultimate fate of the Duchies now occupied by the Austro-Prussian arms?

The idea that they should be restored to Denmark in statu quo ante bellum, would not be worth any consideration, or even mention, were it not that within the last few days a story has obtained at Copenhagen that the Danish Minister at St. Petersburg is on his way to his own country, bearing a Russian proposition by which this solution of the difficulty may be arrived at, the Duchies restored to Denmark in their entirety, and the integrity of the Danish monarchy preserved. Without making any observations on this story, of which we do not know enough to authorise any conjecture, we may turn to the next proposal, by which it was once hoped that concord might be reestablished; it is that known as the 'personal union,' according to which the present King of Denmark should be accepted as Duke of Slesvig-Holstein and Lauenburg, but should keep that character perfectly distinct from his possession of the crown of Denmark. This proposition was at first favoured by the neutral Powers as one which might combine a respect for the wishes of the Germans with a maintenance of the treaties of 1851-2; it also found favour in the Cabinet of Vienna, whose interest it must always be to maintain, as far as possible, a respect for European treaties, and who had no wish to throw more power than necessary into the hands of their Prussian rivals. Now, however, the Austrian Government has positively declared itself disengaged from the Treaty of London, and has required a more sweeping change. Nevertheless, the party for personal union still exists in Vienna, and may be brought again into prominence by the varying fortunes of the Conference.

If, however, all idea of the maintenance of the ancient order of things is to be thrown overboard, two alternatives present themselves: the Duchies may either be reannexed to a German neighbour, as Prussia, or formed into a new and independent State. To the former of these alternatives a host of objections arise from all quarters. It was first formally mooted by the Feudalist party in Prussia, under the guidance of Count von Arnim-Boytzenburg. It is natural, therefore, that it should be viewed with peculiar dislike by the Democratic party as the offspring of their bitterest internal enemies. Nor does it find much favour with the Feudalists in general, or the King of Prussia himself, since, if it is to be formally effected, an appeal must be made to the suffrages of the people of the Duchies—an appeal totally contrary to the principles of Feudalism or the maxims of Prussian despotism. By Austria it is disliked as tending to aggrandise Prussia; by the Roman Catholics as an addition to the power of Protestantism in North Germany; finally, by the general Democratic party throughout Germany as giving fresh power to the King of Prussia, the representative of military despotism in that country. In spite of these manifold objections, we suspect that this is the conclusion which would be found for the present difficulties were no foreign neutral influence brought to bear upon the question. The other alternative which presents itself, should this not find favour with Europe in general, is the formation of the Duchies into an independent State. It is here only that the claims of the Duke of Augustenburg can be admitted, by all who do not consider family interests paramount to the welfare of nations or the maintenance of treaties; only if it be found necessary to constitute a totally new State, need we consider whether the Duke has any priority of claim to its sovereignty. It is understood that this was the proposal last made to the Conference of London by Austria, Prussia, and the Federal Diet: whether it was made bonâ fide, or only on the principle of a German huckster who asks a price of which he only expects to obtain half, yet remains to be seen. The Germans are extremely anxious to set up Federal maritime fortresses in the Baltic as a support of their nascent navy; and it was once thought that it would be more easy to obtain Kiel and Rendsburg for this purpose from the small Duchy of Slesvig-Holstein than from the great Kingdom of Prussia. The Duke of Augustenburg, however, has been perversely unfavourable to any idea of giving up these fortresses should he ever become their master, and has in consequence heard from the German press some very bitter sermons on the text—'Beggars should not be choosers.'

We need not say that where two solutions of a question are given differing so widely as those before us, a compromise or middle course has been suggested, the fruit of the earnest endeavours of England for pacification. According to this it is proposed that a line should be drawn through Slesvig, separating the two nationalities as nearly as possible; that all to the north of that line should be incorporated with Denmark, and all to the south be considered part of the German Confederation. The difficulties presenting themselves on every attempt to define such a line as proposed are most varied—partly from the peculiar configuration of the country, in which Danes and Germans are inextricably confused, several wholly German districts lying north of others entirely Danish; partly from the exorbitant demands of the Germans, who, as we see, at present claim the whole of the Duchy; partly again from the vociferous complaints of certain German sympathisers in the district which it is proposed should be incorporated with Denmark. The Germans have condescended to accept the compromise, if the line be drawn through Apenrade, about twenty-five miles south of the present frontier of Jutland: the Danes, on the other hand, supported very strongly, it is said, by England, demand that the boundary should be the river Schlei and the Dannewerke, which is again about twenty-five miles south of the line proposed by the Germans. Adhuc sub judice lis est; but the Danes have positively declared that should their concessions not be accepted, they will return to their former political position, and stand or fall by the Treaty of London of 1851. The amount of country under dispute is barely 625 square miles, and might be purchased over and over again, as has been very pertinently remarked, by the sum required for the expenses of further warfare. Still the principle of which Denmark is the champion, and, alas! the victim, is one of the greatest importance: her conduct has throughout been a protest against the superiority of armed force over the stipulations of treaties; and she may rest satisfied that her gallant conduct will obtain for her a European position far superior to that of some countries equal to, nay even larger than herself, should the proposed dismemberment of her territory take place.

DENMARK.

The idea of a personal union of the Kingdom with the Duchies has not been favourably viewed in Denmark. The Dagbladet says that 'any king of Denmark who could accept a proposal for the constitution of Slesvig-Holstein into a separate State within the Danish monarchy would learn that the people decline to sacrifice their national independence at any price.' The notables of Copenhagen have presented an address to the King embodying similar sentiments.

On the 8th inst., the King opened the new railway between Copenhagen and Elsinore. The line is of some importance, as it crosses the Sound by means of a ferry on the American plan, and thus is a means of direct communication between continental Europe and the Scandinavian peninsula. A most enthusiastic account is given of the reception of the King and royal family at the various stations, and of the dinner which crowned the festival. All the loyal toasts were drunk with enthusiasm; the King returned thanks for himself, the Princess of Wales his daughter, and the rest of the royal family; he expressed with great earnestness the profound sympathy which all of them, both present and absent, felt for the sufferings of his people, and their aspirations for the future success and happiness of Denmark.

FRANCE.

The funeral of Marshal Pelissier, Duc de Malakoff, took place on the 9th inst., with the highest military honours which France could bestow. The body had been transported to Paris under the charge of the Abbé Suchet, vicar-general of Algiers; he delivered it over formally to the ecclesiastical authorities of the Hôtel des Invalides with a few words expressive of the loss which Algiers had suffered in the death of the Marshal; he added that the sword which the deceased had left to the Chapel of Notre Dame d'Afrique would be preserved as a glorious memorial of a mighty warrior. The actual ceremony was solemnised in the chapel of the Invalides; it began at midday, but before that time all the available space within the building had been filled by those who had received tickets of invitation. On the esplanade in front was drawn up a large mass of troops, about 20,000 in number, of all branches of the service, clad in the insignia of military mourning; in the interior of the building the Invalides or pensioners formed ranks between which the procession was to pass to the chapel. The walls of the sacred edifice were hung with black, and adorned with the names of the places made famous by the Marshal's exploits, the Morea, Algiers, Isly, Malakoff, Sebastopol, and others; also with the armorial bearings of the deceased, with the triple flags of France, England, and Sardinia in the crest, and a Zouave and a Highlander for supporters. The pall was carried by Marshal Vaillant, representing the army, Count Walewski, representing the privy council, and the Marquis de Hautpoul, for the Senate; the chief mourners were General Pelissier, of the Marine Artillery, brother to the Marshal; the Marquis Valeria Constant, inspector of hospitals, his brother-in-law, and two of his nephews. The Emperor, the Prince Napoleon, and the Princess Mathilde, were represented at the ceremony; there were also deputations from the clergy, the province of Algiers, and the different diplomatic bodies resident in the capital. A salute of thirteen guns announced the commencement of the service; the absolution was pronounced by the archbishop of Paris, after which the car on which the body lay was drawn to the great gates of the chapel, and the whole body of troops marched past their great commander for the last time; another salvo of artillery was then fired, the car was taken back to the centre of the chapel, and the body removed to a niche in the vault especially destined to the Governors of the House, in which it is hereafter to remain. Below it are the niches occupied by the Marshals d'Ornano and St. Arnaud, and on its left that in which rests Admiral Hamelin, the Commander of the French fleet in the Black Sea in 1855. Holy water was then sprinkled over it, the last prayers of the office were said, and the great soldier was left to his eternal repose.

The appeal of La Pommerais to the supreme tribunal was, as we stated last week, unsuccessful; equally so the petition to the Emperor for mercy, although supported by the agonised prayers of his father and his wife. The Empress herself had an interview with Madame La Pommerais, and was moved even to tears by the entreaties of the poor woman; but the crime was too flagrant to admit of condonation, even had not the peculiar circumstances of the case, in which an educated man was convicted of the most heinous crime known to the law, been sufficient to dictate a prudent severity. The crowd collected on the evening of the 8th on the Place de la Roquette, at the first sound of the preparations for the erection of the fatal instrument; the people were with difficulty restrained by a detachment of cavalry from pressing too closely upon the workmen

At 5 A.M. on the 9th inst., the condemned man was informed that his last hour was come; he passed a few moments in the company of the priest, who administered to him spiritual consolation, and then never again opened his lips; he underwent with firmness the awful 'toilette' which the guillotine requires of its victims; his hair was cut short from the back of his neck, and a cloak thrown loosely over his shoulders. He then walked to meet his doom with as firm a step as his shackles would allow, showing no sign of feebleness save a mortal paleness and a slight drooping of the head. He embraced his confessor, and ascended the steps of the scaffold, supported by the executioner; in three seconds more, the justice of man was accomplished, and the body had disappeared from the eyes of the spectators.

A remarkable application of mechanical electricity will probably soon be adopted by the French Senate, as a means of recording the votes of its members on any subject. In a trial of the instrument lately made in the Chamber, certain boxes were produced, one of which will be placed on the desk of each senator, each fitted with a black and a white knob; these are connected by telegraphic wires with an indicator lying on the table of the President, and containing the names of the voters; at the base of the indicator are two larger plates, on which the sum total of the black and of the white votes will be given. The machinery is put in motion by the President, who by touching a knob on his right hand establishes communication between the voters and the indicator; the voter then presses either the white or the black button on his private box, and the indicator immediately shows either a black or a white disc opposite to his name; the President then closes the controversy by cutting off the communication, and sets in motion the mechanism by which the black and white votes are added up separately. Where secrecy is required, the object is attained by a very ingenious machine transferring the action of the electric spark to any other disc than that opposite the voter's name. This remarkable invention, the precursor and herald of those happy times, which will doubtless one day arrive, when all our debates, including the arguments pro and contra, the explanations, and even the personal abuse, will be done by machinery, is due to M. Ch. Gallaud, a civil engineer.

The season is now at an end in Paris; the labours of the legislature have ceased, the absorbing pleasures of the turf are over, the Court has retired to Fontainebleau, even the Japanese Ambassadors are meditating a trip into the country. Paris is left a prey to the fierce sun of June and July, and to the untiring exertions of English visitors.

A STORY has gone the round of the journals stating that an untoward accident had happened to the Emperor in the course of a boating excursion; it was said that he had by some means fallen from the boat into the water, and while struggling in it had received a wound in the head through the awkwardness of an official, who attempted to hand him an oar. It is now stated that the story has no other foundation than the fact that the boat into which the Emperor was stepping had given a violent lurch, and taken in a large amount of water; but His Majesty had sprung out on land with agility, and without suffering accident or other inconvenience.

THE end of the controversy between M. Renan and the Minister of Public Instruction, may be told in a few words; it will be remembered that M. Renan had declined to recognise any authority on the part of the Minister to remove him from his professorial chair, and had consequently declined the office of sub-librarian offered to him in substitution. The Emperor has now, by a special decree, declared M. Renan to be removed from the Chair of Syriac and Hebrew Literature, and accepted his refusal of the post of sub-librarian.

AN appropriate present has been made to M. Berryer by the printers of Paris in recompense for his successful defence of them on a charge of conspiracy or illegal coalition in 1862, for which service he had absolutely declined all pecuniary fee. The present consists of a copy of Bossuet's 'Oraisons Funèbres,' magnificently bound. The printing and binding will be perfectly unique, as the only copy of the work struck off is that presented to this eminent advocate.

PRUSSIA.

THE Emperor and Empress of Russia arrived at Potsdam on the 9th inst.; they were received at the station by the King of Prussia. The party assembled to meet them at the palace consisted of the members of the royal family and the Grand-Duke and Duchess of Mecklenberg. On the 10th inst. a grand review of the Prussian troops was held, at which the King took his position as commander-in-chief of his army, and saluted the Emperor in that character; it was followed by a lunch at the famous Orangery, and in the evening a supper was given by their Imperial Majesties. In the midst of the festivities business was not altogether forgotten; Prince Gortschakoff had a long interview with Herr von Bismark in the presence of the Russian ambassador, and again another with the King himself. It is now officially stated that the Emperor of Russia cedes any rights he may have to the succession of the Duchies to the Grand Duke of Oldenburg. It is supposed that the latter may be induced to transfer his present territories to the King of Prussia as the price of his support in the claim which he of Oldenburg makes to the Duchy of Slesvig-Holstein. Prussia would thus become possessed of a valuable strip of seashore commanding the base of the Bay of Kiel.

AUSTRIA.

A CURIOUS law of force might be deduced from the movements of the crowned heads of Europe during the last few years, corresponding somewhat to Newton's famous law of attraction. As long as each sovereign keeps within his own dominions, the law appears to be in abeyance, or rather to neutralise itself by counter-attractions. But no sooner does one royal personage pay a visit to another, than the combined influence of the two acts upon the neighbouring emperors and kings, and draws them to the same point: put three crowned heads together in any part of Europe, and their neighbours hurry to meet them, as the drops of dew on a leaf run into and coalesce with one another by the physical law of attraction. We need not be surprised, therefore, to hear that the Emperor Francis Joseph is on the point of visiting Kissingen, to pay his respects to his Imperial cousin of Russia. We must consider it not as an action of political significance, but merely as the exemplification of a natural law, consequent on the meeting of the King and the Emperor at Potsdam. It is true that Herr von Rechberg accompanies him, and doubtless that distinguished diplomat will furnish some interesting topics of conversation. There is an idea about that a treaty is to be really concluded between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, for the mutual guarantee of their Polish possessions.

RUSSIA.

THE Emperor of Russia has commissioned the Grand-Duke Michael to enquire into the sufferings alleged to have occurred in the Circassian exodus. The Grand-Duke has made a personal inspection, and has reported that they have been much overrated; the people are provided with rations by the Government, and no epidemic exists among them. The sufferings have nearly all occurred during the voyage to Trebizonde and after the arrival of the emigrants, in consequence of the neglect of the Turkish officials. In another despatch he informs the Emperor that the war in the Caucasus is at an end; no tribes remain in a state of rebellion. The last statement is somewhat ambiguous, and is not exactly a denial of the statement made in Western Europe, that no tribes remain in that country at all.

A RAILWAY is about to be formed from Moscow to Sebastopol; it has been undertaken by the International Company of London, and the works will be commenced in the course of the present year.

THE Journal de St. Pétersbourg states that the mission of M. de Kisseleff as ambassador to Rome has come to an end, and that in consequence M. de Meyendorff, the chargé d'affaires, has received orders to present to Cardinal Antonelli M. de Kisseleff's letters of recall. This is apparently the consequence of the Pope's anathema against the Polish atrocities.

ITALY.

WE published last week, with some reservation, a statement that the Austrians had celebrated the battle of Magenta as a victory, and that General Benedek had held a review at Verona in honour of the anniversary. The story appeared very improbable, and turns out to have been a mere fiction of the Italian journals. The only grain of truth in it was that the Austrians had celebrated the day by a mass for the repose of the souls of their comrades who fell in that battle. The story of the review had absolutely no foundation, and General Benedek was on the day in question many miles from Verona.

GREECE.

THE Maltese telegraph had last week, by some odd mistake, of which no account is given, declared that a terrible explosion had lately taken place at Corfu. It was, primâ facie, not impossible that such should occur in the bustle of a new arrival. It appears, however, that the scene of the disaster was Tripoli, due south instead of due north of Malta; in other respects, the account was correct.

The King of the Greeks has been received in his new province of Ionia amidst the greatest enthusiasm. A decent farewell was taken of the English, whose value was fairly recognised when they left the place. Unfortunately, Sir Henry Storks, late Commissioner, took the opportunity of his last official act formally to declare the country in a state of bankruptcy. The fact is, that the bankruptcy had long existed, but had been put out of sight by the liberal remittances from England. Now, however, that they are to be thrown entirely on their own resources, there is no use in shutting their eyes any longer to the uncomfortable fact.

PERU.

IT appears that the Government of Peru has solicited the mediation of the United States for the arrangement of their differences with Spain. The Madrid journals, however, state that the Government of Spain has decided to come to an understanding on the disputed points only by direct communication with Peru. The Peruvian consul has addressed a letter on the subject to the Epoca of Madrid, in which he states that he has documentary evidence to prove that Señor Salazar y Mazarredo sent no ultimatum to the Peruvian Government before proceeding to the violent measure of seizing upon the Chincha Islands. Señor Mazarredo arrived in Europe by the steamer Seine; he reports that the Peruvian authorities decline to enter upon any negotiations until the Spanish forces have evacuated all the territory seized. Several attempts were made upon the life and liberty of Señor Mazarredo by the Peruvians during his homeward voyage. A conspiracy had been formed to seize him when on board the steamer Talca, proceeding from Peru to Panama: it was frustrated by the captain of H.M.S. Leander, who informed the Peruvian admiral that, should any such event occur, he should feel it his duty to seize all the Peruvian men-of-war lying in the port. Four emissaries were then engaged to murder Señor Mazarredo on his arrival at Panama; these worthies deputed their office to a body of negroes who very nearly succeeded in effecting their object; Señor Mazarredo was obliged to take refuge in the house of Mr. Nelson, while the negroes attacked and almost destroyed the French Consulate, in which they believed him to be hidden. Even after his departure from Panama, he was followed by a band of assassins as far as Aspinwall, and only owed his safety to the energy and courage of the officers of the English mail-steamer.

MEXICO.

ACCOUNTS from Mexico are of the most favourable description for the new order of things as inaugurated by French intervention. Not only are most enthusiastic preparations being made for the reception of the Emperor Maximilian in the city of Mexico, not only have fresh victories been won, and whole squadrons of Juarists brought over to submission to the Empire, but the very reverses, such as they are, which the cause of order has suffered, promise for it the greater permanency. Juarez still asserts his power in Nueva Leon, from which province he has been able to drive Vidaurri, the governor of it; Vidaurri has taken refuge among the Confederates; his more credulous secretary trusted to the tender mercies of the Federal authorities, and was consequently delivered up to a barbarous death at the hands of the Juarist officer Cortinas. A French general, on his return from the country infested by the principal Juarist bands, gives an account of their proceedings, proving them to be more incredibly barbarous, more monstrously savage and inhuman than any that were ever contemplated in the mind of the most bloodthirsty cannibal. 'Yet these,' says a French correspondent, 'these are the men who possess the sympathies of the Federal American press; these are they to whom the Federals have given up refugees claiming the right of hospitality and asylum.' So incontestable has been the evidence of the barbarities practised by these wretches, that General Bazaine, commanding the French troops, has issued a circular ordering that all persons known to belong to these bands shall be shot as soon as captured; and that all against whom there may be suspicion shall be tried by drum-head court-martial, when taken; and if convicted, executed within twenty-four hours.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

FEDERAL RECRUITING.

ON Thursday, in the House of Lords, the Marquis of Clanricarde rose, pursuant to notice, to move for papers in reference to the enlistment of British subjects by the Federals. He said that, besides our duty to our fellow-subjects, it was a moral duty to put a stop to this recruiting. If proper measures of prevention had been taken long ago, the war in America would have ended before now; and if the recruiting was stopped now, he believed it would bring the war to a comparatively early termination. The Federal Government, being unable to recruit its armies with its own subjects, had for two years been intent on filling its armies with foreigners, and more especially with British subjects. The attempts of our Government to preserve a strict neutrality had not procured us much credit. One of the belligerents had been plentifully supplied with arms and ammunitions of war from this country, yet no sooner was it proposed to supply the other belligerent with ships, a course which would practically place the resources of this country impartially within the reach of both parties, than the Government felt itself compelled to assert its neutrality. It was notorious that the Federal Government had approved agents in England and Ireland for the purpose of enlisting recruits. Nor was the intention disguised, for the Federal Secretary of State had proposed a Bill to Congress, which, though nominally a measure for encouraging immigration, was in fact a scheme for recruiting the army with foreigners. The Bill did not pass, because it was thought that such a manifestation might arouse the opposition of our Government. It was openly stated that a regiment of 1,500 men had been raised in Germany, and the men were to sail as soon as ships could be provided for them. Now, this was a case that the Foreign Enlistment Act was intended to prevent. The noble Lord, after pointing out how ridiculous was the pretext that these men were wanted for industrial purposes, and that it was our duty to prevent our fellow-subjects from becoming victims of the sanguinary struggle, dwelt upon the manner in which unfortunate emigrants were kidnapped on their arrival in America, and in some cases, where such men attempted to desert, they were shot at once without trial. Were we to continue on terms of amity with a nation that treated us in this manner? If remonstrances could not maintain the honour of the country and protect our fellow-subjects, we ought to go to war, or otherwise what was the use of spending 30,000,000*l.* a year for our army and navy? We had supplied the Federals not only with arms, but with men. He thought the nations of Europe were to blame for the continuance of this war. It was not, perhaps, just now, when two great armies were confronting each other, a time for interference; but there had been times when he thought interference would have been effectual. He hoped in a very few weeks there would be an opportunity for the nations of Europe to take those steps by which alone he believed the horrible and utterly fruitless carnage could be terminated.

Lord Brougham, in seconding the motion, said he deeply lamented the cruel war in America, and he highly disapproved the conduct of the Federal Government for taking British subjects into their armies, even supposing they did not trick them into enlisting. Formerly, the people of the United States complained bitterly of our employing foreign troops to subdue them. Yet now they were attempting to conquer the Confederates by foreign troops. In 1812, he (Lord Brougham) had been called the attorney-general of Mr. Madison and the tool of Mr. Jefferson. He wished his former clients would listen to him, and at last restore peace to their country. Europe reprobated the continuance of the war. He did not feel the time had arrived for intervention; but he hoped before long in occasion would arise when, in conjunction with France, we should interfere with effect to restore peace.

Earl Russell said that Lord Lyons had continually remonstrated with Mr. Seward, and that he had been vexed and distressed by the proceedings at Boston. Respecting the sale of ships of war to a belligerent, his Lordship observed: 'If the ship went, as some of the American judges have in certain cases found was the fact, merely with a crew sufficient to take the vessel into the port of a belligerent, that might be a case somewhat analogous to the carrying of cannon and muskets. But when the vessel and crew go forth already equipped from the coast of the neutral, and commit hostilities directly they get to sea against a State in amity with Her Majesty, it is evident that that is quite a different proceeding from carrying muskets over from your own coast to a belligeren's coast.' Her Majesty's Government had not allowed ships to go from this country armed and ready to commence hostilities if they could prevent it. [We are not aware that any attempt has been made to send out ships armed and ready for hostilities from this country.] Earl Russell said he condemned the Federal Government for their want of attention to the remonstrances of Lord Lyons, because such acts of injustice were calculated, if not redressed, to lead to war. It must be remembered, however, that 'the Confederate States are in the constant habit of ordering conscriptions and forcing British subjects to serve under their standard. When our consuls have remonstrated, they have been told, in the first place, that the men might apply to the courts of justice, and then, when they have repeated their remonstrances, they have been sent away altogether. If, therefore, we have to complain of great injuries on the part of the Federal States, we have no less reason to complain of the conduct of the Confederate States; and if war is our only remedy, we must go to war with both belligerents.' [We have referred to this observation in our leading columns.] The remonstrances should be continued; and Her Majesty's subjects should be warned that when they were asked to emigrate for labour with high wages, they were being entrapped to recruit the Federal armies. He agreed with Lord Brougham that it was a horrible war, but though it was to be hoped that it would soon cease, he feared that any interference of ours would be useless. 'Still,' said his Lordship, 'it is dreadful to think that thousands of men are being slaughtered for the purpose of preventing the Southern States from acting on those very principles of independence which in 1776 were asserted by the whole of America against this country. Only a few years ago the Americans were in the habit, on the 4th of July, of celebrating the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence, and some eminent friends of mine never failed to make eloquent and stirring orations on those occasions. I wish, while they kept up a useless ceremony—for the present generation of Englishmen are not responsible for the War of Independence—that they had inculcated upon their own minds that they should not go to war with 4,000,000, 5,000,000, or 6,000,000 of their fellow-countrymen who want to put the principles of 1776 into operation as regards themselves.' He should have no objection to produce the papers; and if the Marquis of Clanricarde would furnish him with reliable evidence of illegal transactions at Cork or elsewhere, he would at once order the parties to be prosecuted.

DENMARK: THE EXTENSION OF THE ARMISTICE.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston, in answer to Mr. Disraeli, said: 'I cannot at the present moment say why the suspension of hostilities was limited to a fortnight. That particular duration was not dependent on any conditions, but was the limit of suspension to which the Danish Government agreed. The other parties wished for a longer suspension, but only a fortnight's suspension was agreed to.' [Denmark objected to an extension of the suspension of the blockade unless Jutland were evacuated, and reluctantly consented to the fortnight at the earnest solicitations of the neutral Powers.]

THE COLONY OF LAGOS.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Cardwell, in reply to Mr. A. Mills, said that the Governor of Lagos was about to proceed to Abbeokuta to endeavour to restore peace between the people of the district and the King of Dahomey, but the Governor had been instructed to confine himself to pacific measures in the prosecution of his mission.

GOVERNMENT DEFEAT IN THE LORDS.

On Monday, Lord Wharncliffe moved an address to the Queen, praying that the decision of the Privy Council for removing the West Riding Assizes from York to Leeds be reconsidered. His Lordship said 'that Wakefield was universally acknowledged as the proper assize town if there was any change, and he could not conceive what had induced the Government to fix upon Leeds.' After considerable discussion, their Lordships divided, and the motion was carried against the Government by a majority of 26.

THE FACTORIES ACTS EXTENSION BILL.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, this Bill was read a second time. Its object is to protect about 18,000 children employed in trades not included in the present Factory Acts. At present these children suffer greatly from working in badly ventilated places, and for an excessive number of hours.

SIR ROWLAND HILL.

In accordance with Her Majesty's message the sum of 20,000*l.* has been voted to Sir Rowland Hill as a reward for his public services.

LADY ELGIN.

An annuity of 1,000*l.* has been voted to Lady Elgin in consideration of the eminent services of her late husband. The Indian Government has also bestowed upon her a like pension.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE:
THE SEWARD-DAYTON CORRESPONDENCE.

THE following correspondence has been submitted to the Federal House of Representatives:—

Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton. (Extract.)

Department of State, Washington, April 7.

Sir,—I send you a copy of a resolution which passed the House of Representatives on the 4th inst. by a unanimous vote, and which declares the opposition of that body to a recognition of a monarchy in Mexico. M. Geofrey has lost no time in asking an explanation of this proceeding. It is hardly necessary, after what I have heretofore written with perfect candour for the information of France, to say that this resolution truly interprets the unanimous sentiment of the people of the United States in regard to Mexico. It is, however, another and a distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time. This is a practical and merely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs, not to the House of Representatives nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States. You will, of course, take notice that the declaration made by the House of Representatives is in the form of a joint resolution, which, before it can acquire the character of a legislative act, must receive first the concurrence of the Senate, and secondly the approval of the President of the United States, or, in case of his dissent, the renewed assent of both Houses of Congress, to be expressed by a majority of two-thirds of each body. While the President receives the declaration of the House of Representatives with the profound respect to which it is entitled as an exposition of its views upon a grave and important subject, he directs that you inform the Government of France that he does not at present contemplate any departure from the policy which this Government has hitherto pursued in regard to the war which exists between France and Mexico. It is hardly necessary to say that the proceeding of the House of Representatives was adopted upon suggestions arising within itself, and not upon any communication of the executive department; and that the French would be seasonably apprised of any change upon this subject which the President might at any future time think it proper to adopt.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. Dayton to Mr. Seward. (No. 254—Extract.)

Paris, April 22.

Sir,—I visited M. Drouyn de Lhuys yesterday at the Department of Foreign Affairs. The first words he addressed to me on entering the room were: 'Do you bring us peace or bring us war?' I asked him to what he referred, and he said he referred more immediately to those resolutions recently passed by Congress in reference to the invasion of Mexico by the French, and the establishment of Maximilian upon the throne of that country. I said to him, in reply, that I did not think France had a right to infer that we were about to make war against her on account of anything contained in those resolutions; that they embodied nothing more than had been constantly held out to the French Government from the beginning; that I had always represented to the Government here that any action upon their part interfering with the form of government in Mexico would be looked upon with dissatisfaction in our country, and they could not expect us to be in haste to acknowledge a monarchical government built upon the foundation of a republic which was our next neighbour; that I had reason to believe you had held the same language to the French Minister in the United States. This allegation he did not deny, but obviously reviewed the resolutions in question as a serious step on our part; and I am told that the leading secessionists have built largely upon these resolutions as a means of fomenting ill-feeling between this country and some others and ourselves. Mr. Mason and his Secretary have gone to Brussels to confer with Mr. Dudley Mann, who is their Commissioner at that place. Mr. Slidell, it is said, was to have gone to Austria, although he has not yet got off.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM L. DAYTON.

Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. Dayton to Mr. Seward. (Extract—No. 461.)

Paris, May 2, 1864.

Sir,—Immediately upon the receipt of your despatch, No. 525, I applied to M. Drouyn de Lhuys for a special interview, which was granted for Saturday last. I then said that I knew that the French Government had felt some anxiety in respect to the resolution which had recently been passed by the House of Representatives in reference to Mexico, and inasmuch as I had just received a copy of that resolution, together with the views of the President of the United States, I begged, if agreeable, to read to him your despatch in reference to the latter. To this he assented, and as the shortest and most satisfactory mode, following out my instructions, I read to him that entire portion of your despatch which applies to this subject, stating at the same time that I thought it was a remarkable illustration of the frankness and straightforwardness of the President. When the reading was closed, M. Drouyn de Lhuys expressed his gratification; and after asking some questions in regard to the effect of laying a resolution upon the table in the Senate, the conversation terminated. The extreme sensitiveness which was manifested by this Government when the resolution of the House of Representatives was first brought to its knowledge, has, to a considerable extent at least, subsided.

I am sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM L. DAYTON.

Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton. (Extract—No. 542.)

Department of State, Washington, May 9.

Sir,—Your despatch of April 22, No. 454, has been received. What you have said to M. Drouyn de Lhuys on the subject of the resolution of the House of Representatives concerning Mexico, as you have repeated it, is entirely approved. The resolution yet remains unacted upon in the Senate. Mr. Corwin was to leave Vera Cruz on the 3rd inst., under the leave of absence granted to him by this department on the 8th of August last.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

William L. Dayton, Esq., &c. WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton. (Extract—No. 561.)

Department of State, Washington, May 21.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of May 2, No. 461, and to approve of your proceedings therein mentioned.

We learn that Mr. Corwin, our minister plenipotentiary to Mexico, is at Havana, on his return to the United States, under leave of absence.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

William L. Dayton, Esq., &c. WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CONFEDERATE FINANCES.

THE following was communicated to the Confederate Senate on May 23, and was referred to the Committee on Finance:—

Treasury Department, Confederate States of America,
Richmond: May 20, 1864.

Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, President, pro tem., Senate.

Sir,—Since the date of my report of the 2nd inst., nearly three weeks have elapsed. During that period it was intended to make sale, at public auction, at the capital, of part of the six per cent. untaxable bonds, with a view to establish the rate at which sales could be made at every commercial point within the Confederacy. Military necessities have prevented this sale and still require its postponement. The aid which it was expected the Treasury would derive from that source is, therefore, delayed for at least a month, and for the expenditures of that period Treasury notes or some other substitute become necessary. The means provided by Congress for supplying the wants of the Government at this time consist of, first, the limited new issue of Treasury notes; second, of the sales of the said six per cent. bonds; and third, of certificates of indebtedness. In my report of the 2nd instant, I have shown that the whole amount derived from taxes during the present year will afford no aid in paying the current expenditure of the Government. This I regard as an imperfect feature of the Tax Bill, and have recommended that it be remedied by additional taxes. The collection of these taxes cannot take place in time to meet the emergency, and resort must be had to one of the other resources.

In the same report I have set forth the reason why an increased issue of Treasury notes would be injudicious, and if these reasons are deemed adequate to justify the conclusion, it follows that resort must be had to the third means of supply—namely, certificates of indebtedness.

The great leading wants of the Government to be supplied at home are clothing, subsistence, and transportation. If measures can be adopted which will enable these wants to be supplied wholly or in part through certificates of indebtedness, great relief will at once be obtained. The railroad companies have generally exhibited so much patriotism, that it is highly probable they will readily accept certificates in part payment of transportation.

The other great wants are supplied by the manufacturers, farmers, and planters, who manufacture the clothing and produce the subsistence stores of the country. If these parties could be induced to accept the certificates for such articles as are the subjects of purchase or impressment, the scheme would be complete. It seems to me that by resorting to a specie basis for all purchases and impressments they could be made more acceptable both to the Government and the owner.

If all articles, when impressed, were valued at the prices of 1860 (when the currency was at a specie standard), or at their present value in coin, and certificates were issued for such value, payable two years after peace in specie, the interest in the meantime to be paid semi-annually in coin or its market value in Confederate notes, a substantial security of the highest value would be obtained. The party giving up his commodities would be better satisfied with the price and mode of payment. During the continuance of the war he would receive the same rate of interest as though his property had been valued in Confederate notes, and after the war he would receive its full value in coin. The Government would be better satisfied, because while it paid no higher interest during the war than it would do under the existing law, it would, after the war, save the loss to which the present exaggerated prices have exposed it. As no material abatement in prices has occurred since the meeting of Congress, it is obvious that the supplies voted by the last Congress must be largely increased unless some such measure of relief should be adopted in the present session. I respectfully recommend, therefore, that the impressment law be amended in conformity with the above suggestions, and that it be extended to all supplies which may be necessary for the support of the army and navy.

I also recommend that a reasonable proportion of the railroad transportation, based upon the charges of 1860, shall be paid in the same way. As the cash expenses of railroads are very large, and require supplies of money for daily use, it is probable that one-third of such charges would be as much as they could afford to take.

To enable the Treasury to meet the payment of the interest on these certificates, it would be advisable to furnish it with the means of procuring coin. A double advantage would thus be gained. The Government would be enabled to pay its interest at a lower rate, and the paying out of so much coin would reduce the difference between the market rate of coin and Confederate securities. I would, therefore, respectfully recommend that an additional appropriation be made to enable the Treasury to purchase and ship as much cotton as may be made available for this purpose. Ten millions of dollars would probably be sufficient at the present session. Respectfully submitted,

C. C. MEMMINGER, Secretary of the Treasury.

'WEST VIRGINIA.'—A Northern paper publishes the following, dated Nashville, May 5:—'A little excitement was created in legal circles in this city yesterday, by Judge Catron, of the United States Supreme Court, who is holding Circuit Court in the United States court-room. An attorney was reading a declaration, setting forth that "One John Doe, a citizen of West Virginia." "Stop!" said Judge Catron. The attorney halted. "Read that again," continued the Judge. "John Doe, a citizen of West Virginia—" "I know of no such State as that," again interrupted the Judge; "strike out that word West, before Virginia." The pleading was amended accordingly and duly filed.'

FRANCE, MEXICO, AND THE UNITED STATES.—On June 1 the New York Times had a leader on the 'Stoppage of the Rebel Rams in France,' in which it observes:—'France is at war with Mexico, or with that Mexican Administration which we still recognise to be the Government of Mexico. We thereby should have it in our power to retaliate at once any damage to our commerce through Confederate vessels built and armed in France, by equipping in our ports vessels of similar character to cruise against French commerce under the Mexican flag.'

BUTLER'S MILITARY DISCIPLINE.—After his late defeat General Butler issued an order reducing Lieutenant Shaw to the ranks for having, 'while in command of the outposts, picketed further back the men under his charge some six hundred yards, thereby losing the position.' The New York World asks what ought to be the punishment of General Butler, who 'was driven back by the enemy under circumstances showing marked incompetence?'

GENERAL LEE'S ORDER ON THE DEATH OF GENERAL STUART.—'General Orders, No. 41.—Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia, May 20, 1864.—The Commanding General announces to the army, with heartfelt sorrow, the death of Major-General J. E. B. Stuart, late commander of the cavalry corps of the army of Northern Virginia. Among the gallant soldiers who have fallen in this war, General Stuart was second to none in valour, in zeal, in unflinching devotion to his country. His achievements form a conspicuous part of the history of this army, with which his name and services will be for ever associated. To military capacity of a high order and all the noble virtues of the soldier he added the brighter graces of a pure life, guided and sustained by the Christian's faith and hope. The mysterious hand of an all-wise God has removed him from the scene of his usefulness and fame. His grateful countrymen will mourn his loss and cherish his memory. To his comrades in arms he has left the proud recollection of his deeds and the inspiring influence of his example.—R. E. LEE, General.'

A DELICATE COMPLIMENT.—The Northern journals publish the 'thrilling adventures' of a Miss Pauline Cushman, who was formerly an actress and lately occupied as a Federal spy in Tennessee. She was captured, imprisoned, and 'rescued.' In reward for her services, she is honoured with a commission as major in the United States army, and her full title is Miss Major Pauline Cushman. This event must be very gratifying to the strong-minded members of the 'Woman's Rights Association.'

GRANT AND M'CLELLAN.—The Boston Courier of May 30 says: 'Having thus entirely abandoned his original plan of operations, which was the direct route to Richmond, General Grant finds himself, after a circuitous march, dreadful battles, and an enormous loss of men, near the position of M'Clellan, upon his advance up the Peninsula with comparatively slight engagements and trifling loss.'

GENERAL LEE'S REPORT.—The following has been published:—'Taylorsville, May 24, 9.30 P.M.—Hon. James A. Seddon,—The enemy has been making feeble attacks upon our lines to-day, probably with a view of ascertaining our position. They were easily repulsed. General Mahon drove three regiments across the river, capturing a stand of colours and some prisoners, among them an aide-de-camp of General Ledlie. R. E. LEE.'

THE RAILROADS FROM RICHMOND. — The Baltimore correspondent of the New York World observes: 'The railroads in the South must be very "peculiar institutions." We have circumstantial accounts of their destruction, but in a few days afterwards I hear of trains of cars running over these very roads. It was asserted positively that some of Butler's troops had destroyed a portion of the Danville road, yet I hear to-day of trains, with troops on board, arriving at Richmond from Lynchburg and Burkesville. So Butler was said to have destroyed the railroad between Richmond and Petersburg. But I am sure the rebel trains are now running between those two places, carrying troops to Richmond.'

THE QUESTION OF SLAVERY IN THE FEDERAL CONGRESS.—On May 31, 124 members of the House of Representatives voted on the Pacific Railroad Bill. After this came on the discussion on the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery in the United States. This immediately thinned the House, and when the adjournment took place there were only 12 members present. The New York Herald considers this a 'virtual defeat' of the 'Constitutional Amendment.'

NEW YORK AND BOSTON.—The New Yorkers are greatly annoyed because the cargoes captured by the Federal cruisers are generally taken to Boston for condemnation and sale. The Daily News of May 30, says: 'New York is studiously avoided by naval officers charged with captured vessels, and if they put in here, they stop merely to obtain supplies, and push on to Massachusetts Bay.' The reason assigned is that the charges are 15 per cent. in New York, whilst they are only 5 per cent. in Boston.

THE LINCOLN 'INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.'—Mr. S. D. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, thought it worth while to make a collection of the principal sayings and doings of the Lincoln Administration and its supporters. A hundred copies being despatched for New York and Washington, General Dix ordered the box containing the books to be detained at Jersey City. Four days later Mr. Carpenter obtained an order for their release, but at the same time Captain Rives told him 'that he had better see General Dix before going in to publish and distribute his book.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1864.

On the Chickahominy.

'I PROPOSE to fight it out on this line if it takes all the summer!' Such were the emphatic words telegraphed to Mr. STANTON from General GRANT on the eve of his second unsuccessful assault on the Confederate lines at Spottsylvania Court House. There are critics who persist that GRANT is fighting it out on this line, though he has almost unaccountably found himself on M'CLELLAN's old ground, with M'CLELLAN's base. We need not argue this question with the Federal organs in this country. If they are satisfied with the strategy of General GRANT, so are we; and as any line must be the best which gets the Federal commander into Richmond, we will at once freely admit that GRANT has done much more for Mr. CHASE and Mr. LINCOLN by transferring his army to the north of the Chickahominy, than he could have accomplished by marching it against the impregnable lines of Spottsylvania or Saxton's Junction. But it must strike the merest tyro in military matters that, if GRANT has a chance of taking Richmond from the east or north-east, it would have been considerably improved had he made York Town, West Point, and City Point his bases of operations, and landed at those points with his whole strength unimpaired, by the losses of half-a-dozen defeats, and the demoralisation they would inevitably produce. It may, of course, be answered that LEE would, in that case, have had the road to Washington open. But nobody can seriously believe that, with GRANT's force of 120,000 men within fifteen miles of Richmond, and 50,000 more to man the defences of Washington, LEE would have ventured to march northward. And there can be no doubt in the mind of any reasonable person, unblinded by prejudice, that GRANT's present lines are not of his own choosing; that he has been driven to the Chickahominy by the superior strategy of LEE; and that his original programme has proved a complete and disastrous failure. Now, what was GRANT's plan? Much has been said about the originality of its conception; and we have been told that the great mind which accomplished the capture of Vicksburg, with a force about five times as strong as the garrison, designed the coup which was to have been the coup de grâce against Richmond. We are sorry to destroy the Northern idol; but the fact is, that GRANT's plan is in reality very little more than a rechauffé of General SCOTT's Anaconda scheme. There was to be the same direct advance of a crushing force from the North, the same auxiliary expeditions from Western Virginia and the Shenandoah Valley, and from Fortress Monroe. General SCOTT soon learned the difficulties of his scheme, and M'CLELLAN at once repudiated it. He foresaw the slaughter that would ensue from an attack upon the Confederate army in carefully selected and entrenched positions, in a densely-wooded, broken country, intersected at every ten miles by rivers that a moderate fall of rain rendered impassable to an army. He chose the level country of the Peninsula, where at least he had an unassailable base of operations, and could always rely on the protection of his gunboats. GRANT ignored difficulties. His presumption has cost him 70,000 men, the flower of the Northern army, and, we repeat, his plan has utterly and ignominously failed. Of the three armies set in motion, SIGEL's has been routed; BUTLER's has been reduced to the defensive; and GRANT's army, having as yet not beaten the Confederates in a single engagement, has been compelled to seek a position which certainly savours more of a prudent regard for the safety of the Federal army, than a bold determination to assault Richmond. And what is the result? That LEE has got GRANT 'where he wanted him'—in front of a series of intrenchments, which can only be taken by vigorous and repeated assaults—in short, at precisely the strongest point in the defences of Richmond. What is more, the Capital of the Confederacy is open to reinforcements and supplies from the whole of the Southern States; all the communications are safe, and LEE's army can be more quickly provisioned and reinforced than GRANT's. It is possible at this moment that the latter General outnumbers LEE, but we are confident that before another month is over, if LEE requires the additional strength, he will be able to give battle with numbers more approaching equality than any he has yet taken into the field, and that there is not a military man in the country or out of it who is in the least doubt about the ultimate failure of GRANT's enterprise.

In our last week's issue we intimated our belief that GRANT would eventually find himself on the Chickahominy, and the latest news proves our impression to have been correct. GRANT found the position taken up by LEE in the angle at the confluence of the North and South Anna rivers too strong after an assault which, by the admission of the Federals, cost him the annihilation of one brigade, and turned eastward again. This time there was no thought of 'flanking.' It was a complete change of base, like M'CLELLAN's famous move from the Chickahominy to the James River. General GRANT deliberately abandoned his whole plan of campaign, and set himself down to the siege of Richmond from the very ground which M'CLELLAN tried in vain, and subsequently declared an unfortunate selection. Moving rapidly day and night along the left bank of the Pamunkey River in a south-easterly direction, GRANT suddenly faced about, crossed that river at Hanover Town, and made again for Richmond, with the White House as his depôt of supplies. His hope seems to have been to occupy M'CLELLAN's old line, and secure a communication with BUTLER's force on the James River. This he was unable to effect. LEE, apprised of this new movement, swung his army round, and, marching in almost a parallel line by the right, was once more found confronting the Federals in force on the north bank of the Chickahominy, at once covering Richmond, and threatening GRANT's communication with his new base on the Pamunkey. General BRECKENRIDGE was on the extreme left of the Confederate line, a portion of General BEAUREGARD's forces was stated to have effected a junction with the right. The latest accounts report General GRANT's line to be about seven miles in length, his right fronting Mechanicsville, his left resting on Cold Harbour. If this be the case, LEE's army must be stronger than is generally supposed. For GRANT is reported in constant fear of being outflanked on his left, and so losing his communication with the White House. The few details that have reached us are, as might be expected, more meagre, more confused, more one-sided than ever. At every step a Federal advance is recorded, thousands of Confederates are killed, and hundreds taken prisoners. For all that, at the very latest dates it appears to have been expected that LEE was on the point of attacking. The most ominous rumours were in circulation in New York and Washington; and reinforcements were said to be eagerly hunted for from every Federal garrison on the Mississippi and from the shattered remnants of the Louisiana and Arkansas armies. On the whole, we think the last news from Virginia is the most favourable yet received since GRANT began his advance. There has been severe fighting, the Federals have suffered very heavily and have made no impression on the Confederate lines. In one assault alone they confess to the loss of 3,000 killed and wounded—more than the whole list of casualties of the allies at the battle of the Alma. Perhaps the best commentary on the campaign is the price of gold. It has steadily risen, in spite of Mr. STANTON's sanguine despatches and Mr. CHASE's desperate remedies, about 22 per cent. since GRANT began his advance—standing at the latest date at the unprecedented rate of 92 per cent. premium.

Yankee Ships under British Colours.

THAT the flag of the Federal merchantmen has been driven from the ocean is a notion that has found ready credence both among the friends and the foes of the Confederate States. The former class of persons are imbued with a just admiration of the skill by which a navy has been obtained small in point of numbers, immensely great in point of efficiency. The idea of defying some hundreds of ships, of all sizes and descriptions, by the employment of two or three vessels combining in the highest degree power and celerity, has appeared to be in happy accordance with that policy which, by a careful adaptation of the means to the end, has accomplished unrivalled achievements with unprecedentedly narrow resources. There is, too, an air of romantic daring about the enterprises of such ships as the Alabama and Florida which strikes forcibly on the imagination, and tempts to exaggeration. Indeed, if calculation be made of the enormous impediments which the lack of home ports and the inhospitable restrictions of foreign ports create, it is matter of amazement to learn that every sea has been illumined with the burning merchantmen of New York and Boston. On the other hand, the enemies of the independence of the Confederate States, together with all those individuals who have made up their minds on the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act without the needless intervention of judges to explain its terms, have never ceased to enlarge on the terrible losses inflicted on the Northern States by what they call the Confederate privateers. Mr. BARING rises in the House of Commons, and spreads a panic among the shipowners of London and Liverpool while he predicts the awful retribution which will fall on the English merchantmen so soon as we go to war with a European Power. Similarly Mr. BRIGHT unfolds Mr. SEWARD's tremendous bill of costs, and, though the Foreign Office repudiates the debt, the Federal sympathisers shudder at the calamities that have befallen the pockets of their friends. Moreover, the mischief is not limited to the burned ships. That is a mere trifle. The terrible thing is, that insurance against war risks does not answer, and that neutral bottoms are in good demand.

Now, it lies in our power, by the aid of some statistics but lately published, to estimate these assertions at their true value, and the process of examination will not be devoid of instruction. First, then, it may be well to discover what has become of all these Federal merchantmen which we are told have been driven from the ocean. Are they rotting in the Northern harbours, while their owners in mute despair await the charterer who prefers the safety of the neutral ship? Or has Mr. GIDEON WELLES bought them all on Government account, and sent them out on futile hunts after speedy blockade-runners and Confederate rams? Nothing of the sort. The Yankee is the smartest fellow on earth, especially when a little knavery is in the wind; and his love for the stars and stripes is not proof against the prospect of a good venture. Figures, however, are the best rhetoricians, and by tables of returns mysteries are often solved. Let us look, then, at an account of the 'United States' vessels registered as British ships within the last few years. The account embraces the vessels so registered not only in the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, but also in British North America. The number of ships then transferred to British subjects in the year 1858 was 33, and the tonnage 12,684; in the year 1859 the number of ships 49, tonnage 21,308; in 1860 the number 41, the tonnage 13,683. So much for the period preceding the disruption of the Union. In the year 1861 the number of ships transferred rose to 126, and the tonnage to 71,673; in 1862 the number was 135, and the tonnage 64,578; while in the year 1863 the number of ships transferred actually rose to 348, and the tonnage to 252,579. Consequently 609 merchantmen, which before the war gloried in hoisting the stars and stripes, now sail under the protection of the British flag.

Before, however, the effect of these transactions on the commerce of the United States is considered, it may be well to look for a moment at the Merchant Shipping Act, and discover by what means a vessel may gain the right to hoist the British ensign. The 38th section of that Act tells us that the person who desires to be registered as the owner of a British ship must go before the proper functionary and subscribe a declaration. Thereby he asserts that he himself is duly qualified to be the owner. Now, the owner of a British ship must either be a born British subject who has never sworn to a foreign allegiance, or he must be a denizen or naturalised; and in either of these last-named cases he must reside in the QUEEN's dominions during ownership, and must have taken the oath of allegiance. The declarant must further state the time when, and the place where, the ship was built, the name of the master, and the number of shares of which he is entitled to be registered as owner. But, above all this, he must swear that to the best of his knowledge no unqualified person is entitled as owner to any legal or beneficial interest in the ship, or to any share in her. That the sanctity of this declaration should not be lightly treated, the law inflicts on the crime of perjury the penalty of fine and imprisonment, and confiscates the vessel to the use of the Crown.

Such, then, being the method of registration, it naturally follows that the shipowners of England and her dependencies have bought whole navies of merchantmen in three years, and the economist fairly stands aghast at the purchasing power of the merchant princes. For it seems clear that unless men have been found sufficiently audacious and unscrupulous to record a solemn lie and run the risk of a heavy punishment, the whole interest of the vendors in each case must have passed absolutely from them.

But there is another document, which throws a little more light on this portion of the subject. In a return to the order of the House of Commons of United States ships transferred to British subjects in the year 1863, not only the name of each vessel, with the name and address of the owner, is furnished, but also particulars of the mortgages with the names of the mortgagees, and the amounts for which the ships are hypothecated. Unfortunately the Registry books contain no record of the names of the sellers, and in ascertaining the nationality of the mortgagees, the reader can only rely on their place of residence and reputation. Now this return, differing from the one already cited, puts the number of transferred ships for the year 1863 at 608, with a tonnage of 328,665, and of course is the more correct of the two. Of these 608 vessels about 490 are free of mortgages, and perhaps it may be conceded that in all these cases the sale of the ship was absolute, and no interest remained in the vendor. Of the remaining 118 about 50 ships are mortgaged to persons not resident in the United States, and so these also may pass muster, though it is clearly a matter of some difficulty to arrive at the nationality of the individuals in question. The rest of the mortgaged vessels are set down to large firms in New York, Boston, and other seaports in the United States. In many cases the sums loaned on the security of the vessels seem to fall but little short of their total value. The vessels, moreover, thus mortgaged are by no means the smallest in the list of the transferred. It will at least be conceded that the suspicion that the mortgagees and vendors are in some instances identical arises naturally on the facts.

But the law itself demands and justifies such surmises. Indeed the courts look with great jealousy on transactions involving the sale of ships by the subjects of a belligerent to the subjects of a neutral power. As a matter of evidence, when once the former possession of the belligerent has been shown, the onus of proving that the sale was in every way absolute and free from fraud is cast on the neutral claimant. If, moreover, the belligerent was proved to be the mortgagee at or immediately after the registration, the task of the neutral would be increased indefinitely. Indeed, if one of such ships was captured by the Confederates and destroyed, it would require a man of considerable intrepidity to proclaim his interest to the British Government and demand reparation.

To a solemn picture, however, there is often a ludicrous side, and to this rule the present case is not an exception. The Merchant Shipping Act prohibits any person from acting as master of a British ship who has not passed an examination in the science of navigation. The Local Marine Boards, together with the appointees of the Board of Trade and of the Shipowners, conduct the ordeal which the candidate must undergo. Rumour asserts that during the past year the examiners have been overwhelmed with work, and that the Yankee nation has furnished the candidates. It is difficult to conceive a more amusing spectacle than an ancient Yankee skipper puzzling his acute brains over the searching questions of the detested British examiner.

Putting together, then, these items of information, we may infer that a very considerable injury has been dealt to the commerce of the North by the enterprise of the Confederate ships. We must suppose that the effect of throwing upon the market many hundred ships in search of purchasers has caused a glut, and compelled the vendors to sell at a heavy loss. But with regard to those ships which, at or after the time of transference, have been mortgaged to firms carrying on business in the United States, it must be admitted that, if not in the eye of the law, at least in all reason and conscience, the interest in them has not entirely been lost to the great mercantile houses of the Yankee nation.

Federal Recruiting and English Neutrality.

Lord Clanricarde did good service on Thursday night by calling the attention of the public, and compelling the reluctant ear of the Government, to a tale of wrong, outrage, and disgrace seldom paralleled in the history of international dealings. It has become the regular, systematic, organised practice of the Federal Government to recruit its armies in Europe, especially in Ireland. When the war broke out, the Northern States had a surplus population which they could spare to the recruiting officer. We do not mean to say that in the North as a whole there was a redundancy of labour. We do not mean that there was in any State more than the State itself could have employed productively. But there was, in the first place, in all the large cities an element positively noxious; a mass of men who had nothing particular to do, and spent their time in doing mischief. A very large proportion of this class, in the hope of plunder and under the temptation of high bounties, was allured to the camp, and impressed on the Federal army that character of license, brutality, destructiveness, and love of booty which has distinguished it ever since. This resource is now exhausted. Tens of thousands of rowdies have been killed, and those who are left set too high a value on their lives to throw them away by exposing themselves to the deadly aim of Southern rifles. Again, there was everywhere a loose, roving, adventurous element in the composition of Northern society, which bore no regular and necessary part in the labour of the country, and could be spared without disorganising that labour. All of this class who had any taste for soldiering, and were willing to face the dangers and hardships of a campaign for the chance of profit or the mere love of adventure, have already been made available as food for powder. Even on the labouring strength of the country a call was made, and men quitted their homes, their business, their farms, their families, to engage in a war which was to be short, glorious, and prolific of reward. The country can spare no more, and no more will go. The terrific slaughter which has distinguished this conflict—due partly to the altered character of modern warfare, partly to the incapacity of Northern generals, partly to the bad discipline of their troops, partly to that wicked and cruel, but undoubtedly politic, recklessness of life which prompted such attacks as that of Burnside on the heights above Fredericksburg and that of Grant on Spottsylvania, and in no small measure to the coolness and accuracy of the Confederate fire—has had a double effect. It has terribly wasted the army in the field, and at the same time it has almost put a stop to recruiting. Men who would perhaps have faced the ordinary risks of a European campaign shrink from the horrors of battles in which ten or twenty thousand men are killed and wounded on one side without any decisive result. The native American, though not a cowardly, is a cautious and calculating animal; he reads the returns of killed and wounded, he sees battalions reduced to companies, and divisions to brigades, by a single battle; and he shrinks from the campaign in which every battle seems to present the perils of a forlorn hope. The chances are too much against him. He will not volunteer, and to press him is a very dangerous undertaking. Thus recruiting is practically at a standstill, and drafting is too hazardous an experiment to be lightly ventured, and too unpopular for a President aiming at re-election. The Federal Government is thrown on Europe for its supplies of men. It gathers Germans by hundreds and Irishmen by thousands: how rapidly, openly, and shamelessly, Lord Clanricarde explained. Recruits are carried away from Cork at the rate of 5,000 a week, on the pretence that they are required as labourers; their passage paid for them, or provided in American ships, and their ambition excited by the enormous promises of the Federal agents who are scattered over Ireland. Many are avowedly enlisted as soldiers—of course not publicly; others go in the bonâ fide belief that they are wanted to work and not to fight, and how these are treated we know on the authority of Federal officials. They are landed, and then they are told there is no work for them. Some enlist in despair; others are treated to drugged drink, and enlisted while in a state of insensibility, the Federal officers proving their complicity in the crime by handing over the bounty money due to the victims to their infamous betrayers. The kidnapping of foreigners is a regular trade in New York and Boston. Hocussed with poisoned liquor, enrolled without their own knowledge, they find themselves, on returning to their senses, hopelessly entrapped. If they protest, they are shot at once, without form of trial, by the Federals; if they submit, they are sent on to the front to be shot as unceremoniously by the Confederates. Such are the means by which the Federal army is recruited; such is the regard paid to our neutrality, to the Queen's proclamation, and to the Foreign Enlistment Act, by those who have constantly invoked our laws against the Confederates—who have rebuked us for selling arms and ammunition as freely to their foes as to themselves, and threatened us with war for furnishing unarmed ships to Southern purchasers.

Lord Russell's reply was in all respects eminently unsatisfactory. He had remonstrated, and would continue to remonstrate; but his remonstrances had hitherto been treated with contempt, and he had every reason to suppose that they would be so treated for the future. If Mr. Seward chose to entrap British subjects in Her Majesty's dominions, the proceeding was a violation of our territorial sovereignty and an outrage on our neutrality, and he was very sorry that Mr. Seward should be guilty of such unworthy conduct. If British subjects are hocussed and entrapped in America, and murdered on attempting to escape from their kidnappers, such a proceeding is a gross offence against the rights of England, and Lord Lyons will tell Mr. Seward that we so regard it. What more could he do? We would ask the noble Lord if he remembers what the Americans did in 1855, and why we could not now repeat that mode of argument. Is Mr. Adams's society so necessary to him that he cannot dismiss the chief agent of this nefarious system from the United Kingdom, and, if necessary, break off diplomatic relations with the Government that sent him here? Are there no other means of coercion if this should not suffice? Might we not threaten, if the North will not respect the Foreign Enlistment Act, to suspend it altogether? and would Mr. Seward regard that menace with indifference? If he did, for what do we spend 30,000,000*l.* a year on our fleet and armies, if not that they may protect the sanctity of Her Majesty's dominions, and the lives and liberty of her subjects in all parts of the world? But, Lord Russell says, if we are to go to war with the North for entrapping recruits from Ireland and kidnapping British subjects in New York, we must also go to war with the Confederates; for they have forced British subjects into the ranks of their army. It is hardly worthy of a Minister of State to draw a comparison between these two cases. The Northerners have swept our subjects into their army by thousands, to save their own blood and enable them to carry on a war of conquest; and for this purpose they have drawn on the peasantry of Ireland and kidnapped chance sojourners in America. The Southerners, in a war of self-defence, have established a universal conscription, touching all residents of the South; and no British subject is called upon to take up arms under that conscription, unless he have been for years a Southern resident, and to all intents other than political a Southern citizen. What hardship or moral wrong is there, if, in the third year of such a war, all residents of whatever nationality are called on to fight in defence of their home, their property, and their adopted country? If they did not wish to share the fortunes of the South, it was open to them, during two years, to depart; as they have chosen to remain and share her fortunes, let them also share the risks of her defence. But the South dismissed our Consuls for remonstrating. No such thing. She first desired that the complaint should be referred to her tribunals; the Consuls refused to refer it; and it was not until they proceeded to bid the enlisted soldiers of the South throw down their arms in presence of the enemy that they were dismissed—that is to say, those were dismissed who had not already been withdrawn by the British Government. Lord Russell himself admitted that their dismissal was just; and in now bringing it up as a grievance he acted disingenuously and dishonestly. The South has done us no wrong: the North is doing us systematic and persistent wrong, which we cannot honourably forbear to resent and punish.

Be it remembered that not only our national honour and dignity, but also our neutrality and fair dealing, are at stake in this matter. The North has complained angrily that we have permitted the South to purchase ships in our dockyards; and we, yielding to that complaint, have seized ships supposed to be intended for the South, and refused them permission to leave our harbours. Yet the two cases are strictly parallel. Every argument formerly used by the advocates of the North and the apologists of the Government to prove that the case of ships and that of arms were not the same, went to prove that the case of a ship was analogous to that of a regiment. 'You have no more right,' it was said, 'to furnish ships to a belligerent navy than regiments to a belligerent army.' Well, we do furnish regiments to a belligerent army, against the will of the Government as we are ready to believe, but we furnish them notwithstanding. Are we to do this, and not to furnish the ships? Are we to put the law in force against the Confederates, and not against the Federals? It is said that the regiments leave our shores unarmed, and are armed and enrolled elsewhere; but this was precisely the case with the ships. At international law we are free to permit or to forbid either, but if we are to maintain an honest and impartial neutrality, we must not refuse to strengthen the Confederates in their weak arm—the navy—while we strengthen the Federals in their weak arm—the army. We must stop the soldiers, or we must not stop the ships. It is not to be endured that we should be told of the irritation produced in the North when their ships are burnt by British-built cruisers, and think nothing of the deep and bitter indignation of the South when her sons are slaughtered by British-born soldiers. We remember how great was the indignation expressed when this country sent German soldiers to put down the American rebellion; are we to forget that the same or greater anger must be excited when the North sends Irish mercenaries to plunder and ravage the seceding States of the South?

Lord RUSSELL, and the Times in his support, argue that our law reaches the ships, but does not reach the men; and therefore we must stop the one, and let the other go. This does not follow. The law was intended to reach both; if we find that it fails in one point, what are we to do? To amend it, if we will; to ignore it, if we please; certainly not to enforce it against one party while allowing the other to evade it with impunity. It should be remembered that the statute is an enabling, not an enforcing one; it gives powers to the Government, but it imposes no obligation. They are at liberty, if they will, to let pass both ships and troops, as they did when GARIBALDI was prosecuting his enterprise in Southern Italy. And if they find that they cannot enforce it impartially, it clearly becomes their duty not to enforce it at all. If they choose to seize Confederate ships under the Act, they are bound to find some way, under or apart from the Act, of putting down Federal recruiting. While they do not this, it is impossible to call them neutral or to believe them impartial. They are committing a great and manifest wrong, which no legal technicalities can palliate, and no difficulties or embarrassments can excuse; and so long as they continue to allow the Federal armies to be recruited in HER MAJESTY'S dominions, so long they are virtually accomplices in a wicked, unjust, and most murderous war, waged for the enslavement or extermination of a gallant and a kindred people.

We cannot but note the manner in which that war is spoken of both by Lord RUSSELL—the friend of Mr. ADAMS and favourer of Federalism—and Lord BROUGHAM, the quondam champion of Abolition. The former pronounces it to be a war in violation of the maxims of 1776—a war against the principles to which the Union owes its being; and it is the more unjust that it is a war, not against revolted subjects, but against sovereign and equal communities, which have voluntarily and peaceably withdrawn from a voluntary and equal Confederation. Lord BROUGHAM pleads earnestly for peace. He dwells on the fearful cost and the sanguinary horrors of the war, and prays only that it may have an immediate end. Nominally, he addresses himself to both parties; really, his words can have no meaning save for the North: for with the North alone it rests to terminate the struggle. The South, fighting only in self-defence, must fight on as long as she is attacked. The North may make peace whenever it will forego the dream of conquest and the lust of dominion; and to that sacrifice it is counselled by so old and ardent a friend as Lord BROUGHAM. We do not suppose that the words of that venerable orator will have any weight with the maddened spirit of a people drunk with vanity and thirsting for blood. But for those who are still capable of reflection they have a significance which cannot be wholly overlooked. How is it, if there be anything honourable or noble, good or wise, in the enterprise in which the North is engaged, that that enterprise is condemned by Englishmen of all parties and every shade of opinion, with the sole exception of a school of politicians who never enjoyed authority or credit with their countrymen, and whose very limited influence the lessons of this war have entirely and for ever dissipated? Surely that quarrel must be a very bad and hopeless one in which Lord BROUGHAM pronounces against the North, and in which a BUXTON gives his voice against the partisans of Abolition!

VOLUNTEERING IN NEW YORK.—The Committee on Volunteering has lately presented a report to the Board of Supervision, in which they say:—'Already the city and surrounding country seem to have been actually drained of their surplus population, until labourers and mechanics can hardly be obtained at rates of wages which even one year ago would have been deemed fabulous, and every day lessens the inducements for men willing to enter the army. We have, therefore, no right to expect that a new call would increase enlistments, and should the enlisting of naval recruits be discontinued, as we deem likely to be the case soon, the filling the quota by enlistments would seem almost impossible. Let us consider the figures a little closer one moment. Estimate the quota under the call for 300,000 men at 11,000, and deduct 1,000 men now raised in excess of the quota, leaving 10,000. Allow the number of recruits to average 30 men a day—which we think a very large number—it would take considerably more than one year to fill the quota by recruiting. If the Government needs men at all, they need them long before that time. In fact, we sincerely believe that no considerable number of men for the army can now be obtained by volunteering. Your committee deeply regret that they are compelled to such a conclusion, and to give expression to it, but the honest discharge of their duty to the board and to their constituents requires that all the facts should be laid before your honourable body and the people of this country.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: May 31, 1864.

THE SITUATION IN VIRGINIA — WHAT WALL STREET THINKS OF IT—SOUTHERN CONFIDENCE—THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION—THE ORGANISATION OF A CONVENTION—MR. LINCOLN TO BE NOMINATED—THE SPLIT IN THE REPUBLICAN PARTY—THE CLEVELAND CONVENTION—THE CHARGES AGAINST MR. LINCOLN—FREMONT'S POSITION—THE CHANCES OF GRANT—DISORGANISATION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—THE CONFESSED OBJECT OF THE WAR—MEXICO AND CONGRESS.

THE war situation continues to be intensely interesting. It is impossible, and would be futile to attempt, within the compass of a letter, to keep track of the movements of armies which are so constantly mystified and misrepresented in the bulletins and by journals, which are the chief and almost the only sources of intelligence. There has been, within a few days, an important change in the position of the two armies in Virginia, and Grant is, as the crow flies, much nearer to Richmond than he was a week ago. There has been, consequently, a great deal of newspaper jubilation in the North over Grant's triumph in having 'outflanked' Lee, and compelled him to retreat. The closet strategists, who win great battles on paper, have a great deal to say now about flanking and outflanking, and have exalted Grant into a wonderful genius for having outwitted Lee, and won some of the most important positions from him. There are two curious circumstances which deprive this laudation of a good deal of its value to General Grant's reputation. One is, that these movements of General Lee, which are described as having been forced upon him by the combinations of General Grant, are such as were exactly pointed out in the journals of Richmond as spontaneous movements to be made by General Lee, with the direct purpose of making his positions stronger than they were before, and of bringing the Federal army into one where it could be most successfully met and baffled. Some of the most decided among the journals attached to the Administration have very plainly expressed their apprehensions that this is the true state of the case. The second and significant circumstance which shows that there is no real faith in the Administrative glorifications over the reported successes of the manœuvres of Grant, is that gold continues to advance. On Monday, in the face of a shower of bulletins posted up in Wall Street, gold went up from 188 to 194¾, and, after fluctuating to and fro, closed at 191¾, or more than three per cent. above the point at which it opened. There was no outgoing steamer, and no extraordinary demand, to account for these fluctuations. It was simply a speculation on the condition of affairs in Virginia, and shows the preponderance of an opinion among the capitalists that all is not going so well with the Union armies there.

With the Confederates confidence in the successful defence of Richmond is apparently unbounded. They claim that in the series of battles thus far the army of Grant has been terribly punished, far beyond the capacity of all the reinforcements he has received to restore it to its original efficiency. They boast that Lee, fighting warily and behind entrenchments, lost comparatively little, and that he has received large accessions from veteran troops, and is now as strong as ever, if not positively stronger, and is master of the positions for the defence of the capital. Butler has been reduced to inaction, Sigel's column defeated and routed, and Averill beaten in South-western Virginia; so that the real points of conflict are in Georgia for Atlanta and in Virginia for Richmond. The bulletins at the North, which give General Sherman credit for a series of victories in Georgia, are not altogether credited here, and are treated as vainglorious exaggerations in Richmond. The duty assigned to General Johnston in Georgia is to protect Atlanta while the great problem is worked out by General Lee in Virginia, and he will certainly do it. The Confederates have no alarms about events on Johnston's line, and they are high in the hope that they will defeat Grant, even if, as is the last report here, the bulk of Butler's forces shall have been transferred to that line. It seems to be the general opinion that a great battle cannot be deferred many days. You will probably get exciting news by the next steamer.

Another great campaign is going on during this week and the next, of which the excited leaders make the grand conflict of battles only an incident. It is the week for settling, or perhaps hopelessly unsettling, the arrangements of the Republican party for the Presidential election in November.

The regular Republican Convention for the nomination of candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency will be held in Baltimore on Tuesday next, June 7. English readers may not understand all that is meant here by a 'regular' Convention. In this country all political parties create a machinery for preserving a permanent organisation. They have their 'regular' committees in each State, through whom alone 'regular' conventions of the party are made in the various districts through whom alone the authorised expositions of party policy are announced and outside of whom is party heterodoxy. The party is not supposed to speak or act except by these organs. It is one of those republican inventions by which a few political managers contrive to govern a party while it seems to govern itself, and through it to govern a country. These State organisations rule the politics of the States, and a central organisation preserves unity in all general matters, so as to blend the whole, under the influence of a National Convention which assembles once in four years to fix a general creed and nominate candidates for Presidency and Vice-Presidency. Every National Convention, before adjourning, appoints a general or national committee of men from each State, with power to call meetings for future Conventions, fix the day and place of meeting, and determine in advance the order of proceeding for the preliminary organisation of the party conventions they summon. The Republican Convention of 1860, which nominated Mr. Lincoln, created the customary national committee, and that committee some time ago appointed Baltimore as the place, and June 7 as the time, for the holding of the nominating Convention for the election of 1864. There is no power to change the time except by the committee: and although there have been very strenuous efforts by a large part of the Republicans, adverse to the renomination of Mr. Lincoln, to obtain a postponement of the nomination, in view of the critical events transpiring, the results of which may seriously affect the opinion of the public on the Presidential question, they have been unsuccessful: the Convention will meet on the 7th, and will be, without doubt, the 'regular' Convention of the Republican party; all other Republican nominations will be held to be heretical.

A device has been suggested as finding favour with some of Mr. Lincoln's more timid partisans, and some who are suspected of being insincere in their professions of adhesion to him—that the Convention of the 7th should meet and adjourn over for a month or two without making nominations, to see whether harmony cannot be restored among the Republicans, who a now at sword's point with each other on the apprehend nomination of Mr. Lincoln for reelection by the Convention Baltimore. But this scheme is not at all likely to succee The Convention will meet, and without a sudden and sweepi change in public affairs, amounting almost to a little revolutio Mr. Lincoln will receive the nomination by a very large vote, it be not made unanimous by the suppression of all e pression of opposition. The party machinery in the States h been so successfully wielded by his friends and dependents, an the power of patronage and the control which the unscrupulou use of military irresponsibility has given him over the person opinions, and fortunes of the leading manipulators of th public opinion, which is made to the order of party leaders, i so immense, that all regular voices of the party are in chorus fo the renomination of Mr. Lincoln.

But there is an intense feeling of hostility to Mr. Lincol within the bosom of his own party, and even in his ow Cabinet and the political household about himself, which, i advance of the nomination at least, threatens to break from th party organisation for the single purpose of defeating him Even the Secretary of the Treasury is accused of being in th intrigue to defeat the party chief with another candidate, afte having been foiled in the effort to supplant him by obtainin the nomination for himself. The elements of this opposition are various and incongruous, but it is fierce, and, in its line a least, uncompromising in the determination that, whatever th consequences, Mr. Lincoln shall not be reelected. To-da there is to be a grand gathering of these malcontents at Cleve land, in Ohio, in mass convention, held under short notice, wit separate calls from different classes of opponents, for the pur pose of consulting on the means of preventing the election o Mr. Lincoln, even after the Baltimore Convention shall hav nominated him.

The original leaders in this movement are the ultra-Radicals of the west, and the extreme Abolitionists of the east, wh arraign Mr. Lincoln for irresolution and insincerity in th management of the slavery question, which they make the sol justification of the war: for administrative imbecility in con ducting it; and for the sordid and personal uses to which he has put the vast means which the people placed in his hands. The charges they make against him for the corruptions he has fostered, and the crimes against the liberty of the citizens he has perpetrated, his open breaches of the Constitution, and the flagrant employment of the army in order to accomplish his personal objects, are made as vehemently as those for which many an unlucky Democrat has been persecuted, plundered, and imprisoned, without the chance of redress, or a word of sympathy from these same railers. The motives for this Radical outbreak were at the outset personal and vindictive. Mr. Lincoln, too feeble to have a policy of his own, vacillated between the factions which beset him, and offended most that one which had the best right to control him, because it had made the emergency which brought him unexpectedly into power, and which, being at the same time fanatical and sincere, would not be contented with equivocal positions, which suited those who were only fanatical for a purpose, and wanted to play at moderation for a purpose also. Fremont is the favourite of these Radicals, and Mr. Lincoln's early discarding of Fremont from his confidence—which, had it been from discernment, would have been a credit to him in many minds, but being a piece of selfish caprice, the renouncing of a policy without convictions, and the sacrifice of a friend without compunction because he might be a rival, was simply a baseness—engendered a resentment which nothing can appease. Fremont himself might possibly be conciliated by a price, if it were high enough and secure to be paid; but the Radicals, whom the disgracing of Fremont alienated, and furnished with the opportunity to clamour for free speech, to denounce the invasions of public liberty, and to pronounce for the non-eligibility of any President, as a cardinal principle for the preservation of free government and the securing of honest administrations, have taken so determined an attitude, and ranged themselves so universally both against Mr. Lincoln himself and the agencies by which his nomination is effected, that I cannot see how it is possible to appease the feud so as to bring to Mr. Lincoln the whole support of the Republican party. The policy of the Administration is to break the force of the Cleveland gathering by intrigue among the members, producing such discords in the definition of objects, that union among them cannot be effected; or, if a nomination can be made, to have it turned upon some person who can be persuaded to withdraw, or, in the course of revolving circumstances, be unavailable. There is a growing party in favour of nominating General Grant; but it seems to be made up by the outside influences of a class of political leaders of various factions, who are thronging to Cleveland to try and make an amalgamation of parties there on a single candidate in opposition to Mr. Lincoln; and the military popularity which Grant has suddenly acquired is needed in order to counteract the official influence of the President over the army, by whose votes the Presidency will in all present probability be disposed of. But the popularity of Grant is something which may be ephemeral, and may perish in the ditches before Richmond. It is moreover suspected that the Administration possesses the assurances of General Grant that he will not be used as a candidate; and therefore they are not afraid of him. Moreover, there is scarcely a possibility, in the demoralised state of the public mind, that an effectual rally can be made against the enormous fusion of influence and corruption with which the President has been able to secure for himself the full endorsement for his whole administration of the regular organisation of the party which elected him, and which will be as unscrupulously used after the nomination has been made, and the question of reelection becomes one of party ascendency. I cannot anticipate such a revolt as will do more than disturb the internal action of the Republicans upon the question which faction among them shall control the Government. It is, I think, past a doubt, that the Democratic party is so utterly extinct as a national organisation, that the Republicans can afford to split and quarrel, and perhaps run two candidates without the fear that any democrat can be elected in consequence of their divisions. It is pretty well settled, by the tone of the democracy in the west, that they hold out there that the success of what is called a war democrat is not worth contending for, and the times are not yet ripening for the success of a peace democrat, although the growth of an outspoken party, which is for stopping the war at once, at all costs, and in every contingency, has of late been singularly rapid. Another year would make it a formidable if not a triumphant party. As it is, the war democrat is only a variety of the same party with Mr. Lincoln and his Republican adversaries, and will be felt in the coming elections only as a make-weight in the turning of the balance of power among factions all equally selfish. Only the shock of a great calamity, the defeat of General Grant, and a failure of this last grand campaign, or a financial convulsion, which will break down the spirit of the country, can shake off from the people the yoke they voluntarily put on, and drive out of office the present incumbents, or their successors of the same creed. So long as the Northern passion for conquest over the South is fed by the hope of success, and war under any pretence is supported by the votes of a controlling majority in the Northern States, will the rule of corruption and violence and lawlessness prevail, no matter in what hands the executive power may be vested. It is the law of this warfare, the very condition of its existence, and never will there be a plausible hope for the restoration of constitutional government and civil liberty, order and freedom, until this atrocious assault upon the rights and independence of the Southern people is abandoned and repented of, and even then after the purification of a generation of struggling and suffering. Presidential elections which do not have this distinct end in view are mockeries, in which the man of earnest faith and conscience sees nothing to encourage him to look hopefully into the future. It is as sad as it is true, that many of the best and purest men in the North believe in their inmost hearts that the happiest thing for the future of the Northern States would be such a crowning disaster as would put an immediate end to the war.

The disposition of the present Congress towards peace, or any attempts to have peace on other terms than the unconditional surrender by the South, not only to the ascendency of the Federal authority, but all the penalties of confiscation, devastation, and punishment as rebels, which conquest by force of arms brings upon the vanquished, has been tested several times lately, with the same uniform result. On the assumption that the arms of the Union are on the point of prevailing, twice within a fortnight have propositions been brought forward by the minority, declaratory of the purpose of the war, that it is for the restoration of the Union under the old Constitution, and proffering to submitting States a full enjoyment of the rights which they enjoyed as members of the old Union, reserving only a 'sound and patriotic discretion' in excluding from the amnesty the chief leaders of rebellion, and twice the propositions have been rejected by lurge majorities. It is a vainglorious assumption that the privilege of returning to the Union will ever be asked for, but the reiterated declaration that the war is to be continued without intent to reestablish the Constitution, and avowedly to employ cruel, bloody, and exterminating means to make a new government, establishes a confessed dissolution of the old government, and vindicates, in the eyes of every candid partisan of the original cause of the North, the righteousness of the eternal resistance to which the universal South pledges itself in every form of heroic resolve.

The Internal Tax Bill is still an unfinished business between the two Houses of Congress, and the New Tariff Bill has just been reported in the Senate. The House of Representatives has passed a resolution to close its sitting on Monday next, June 6; but the Senate has not yet acceded, and the probabilities are that the session will be protracted, in consequence of the great quantity of unfinished business and the idleness of this and the next week, which will be devoted to the business of electioneering, on the Presidential canvas for the nominations.

The House Committee on Foreign Affairs is very much exercised about the Monroe doctrine, and the way in which the Administration is dealing on that subject with the French Government and with Congress. The President's message, communicating the correspondence of Mr. Seward and Mr. Dayton with each other, and with M. Drouyn de Lhuys, has raised a great deal of feeling. American vanity is deeply wounded at the haste with which deprecatory messages were sent off to France, to break the force of a unanimous vote passed by the representatives of the American people, by assurances that the vote really means nothing, and will come to nothing, because the House has no power to give any practical force to its opinions, and the President does not intend to let it influence his own course in any way which will give offence to the French Emperor. The perplexity of the House is extreme. There is no idea of renouncing the policy announced in this declaration against Imperialism and French intervention in Mexico; but the Administration is using the absorbing war question so as to break their unanimity on the expediency of repeating it, so as to make it a practical question, till the war is over. Under such persuasives they may hold back, and avoid any further proceedings which might embarrass the Government with the necessity of answering the sharp demand of the French Minister whether it meant war, with another apologetic explanation of the insignificance of the House of Representatives. The diplomatic situation will continue officially 'satisfactory.' The French Emperor will have no right to utter complaint while this Government publicly undertakes to use all its own functions to repress the national sentiment of hostility to his policy in Mexico; but he is not so wise a monarch as he is esteemed to be, if this undertaking be accepted as the guarantee for a peaceful acquiescence in the Mexican Empire. Congress chafes under these restraints on its free action; and already the conduct of the Administration in this propitiation of France at the cost of renouncing a favourite American idea, and discrediting before Europe the unanimous act of an American House of Representatives, is already taken into the political arena. The Cleveland Convention makes it the topic of biting attack on the Administration, and every party at the coming election will make haste to pledge itself to the revival and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine. It will be very absurd and very impracticable, but that will not prevent it from being very mischievous; and all experience ought to warn all foreign governments that there is no limit to the extent to which a popular passion in this country will hurry the Government and people.

A Fight between two Federal Senators.—Washington has been entertained with a fight between Senator Voorhees (Democrat) and Senator Chandler (Republican). It appears that they met in the evening at the National Hotel. Mr. Chandler took a seat near to Mr. Voorhees, and, says the Washington Star, 'he was in conversation with a lady, and was denouncing copperheads and peace men in pretty sharp terms; and in order to show her how much he abhorred the latter, he stated something to the effect that if he were standing between heaven and hell and saw a copperhead in heaven he would plunge into hell; furthermore, that he would not help a copperhead out of hell if he could, for he believed they were made up of all that was villanous and hellish.' Mr. Voorhees came up and struck him roughly in the face, and a fight ensued. After a while friends interposed and separated the senators.

The Will of Butler's Brother.—Andrew J. Butler's will has been offered for probate in the Surrogate's office in New York. His estate is valued at two millions of dollars, the half of which he bequeaths to his brother. The New York Express says, 'It is understood that there are several New Orleans claimants who intend to file petitions as creditors.'

LETTER FROM TEXAS.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Houston, Texas: May 12, 1864.

THE 'UNKNOWN' COUNTRY—THE CAPTURE OF FEDERAL GUNBOATS AT CALCASSIEU PASS—ACCOUNT OF BANKS'S LATE CAMPAIGN—THE NUMBERS ENGAGED—THE LOSSES OF THE FEDERALS.

A Correspondent of the New York Times, writing from Banks's army on its late advance up Red River, makes mention among other things of inhabitants vanishing before that army towards Shreveport and the 'Unknown.' Texas has indeed been an unknown country to the Federals since this war began, and, to most who have attempted to penetrate it, 'that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller ever returns.' I need not refer you to the battle of Galveston, in which General Magruder, with a handful of horse-marines, captured one gunboat, caused the destruction of another, and sent the balance of the fleet ignominiously to sea under the white flag—an exhibition of the white feather, I venture to say, unsurpassed in this or any other war. Nor need I mention the heroic capture, a few days after, of the Morning Light and Velocity, two armed vessels twenty miles at sea, by Major Watkins, on a river steamboat that required more bravery to go to sea in than is demanded to storm a fortress. These you have heard of. You have also heard of the famous capture of Brownsville and Arkansas by General Banks last winter, as well as several miles of islands along our coast, which were abandoned by General Magruder because not worth the trouble of holding. The friends of General Banks attempted to make some capital for him out of these conquests, but, for the most part, his praises fell upon the ear of a public not now to be 'pleased with a rattle and tickled with a straw,' as earlier in the war.

You have doubtless, too, heard some accounts of the defence of Sabine Pass by Lieutenant Dowling and his forty Irishmen on the 8th of last September, when attacked by gunboats with a view of making a safe landing for 15,000 Yankees under Franklin, who were at hand on transports, and how Dowling, with his six smooth-bore guns on an open breastwork, captured the gunboats Sachem 5 and Clifton 6, together with their crews, 385 men, and drove the balance of the fleet to sea, he himself not daring to show his disarmed prisoners how small his force was, lest they might turn upon him and overpower him. But you have not heard of the last event that has occurred in the neighbourhood of this famous Pass.

There is, a few miles east of Sabine, on the Louisiana coast, a pass or entrance, called Calcassieu Pass, leading into Lake Calcassieu, a noted entrance for small-fry blockade-runners. A few days since word reached here that there were two light-draught gunboats at the pass endeavouring to work their way in, in order to pick up what might be found in the lake. Orders were at once despatched to Colonel Griffin, commanding at Sabine Pass, to go and attack them. He did so at once, with a light force and two pieces of artillery. The next morning a despatch was received from him that he had captured two gunboats and sixteen guns, and 126 prisoners. That part of the country, accordingly, remains unknown to the Yankees. Their future charts should have the word 'dangerous' printed on that part of the coast from Sabine Pass to Calcassieu. It certainly has proved more dangerous to them than Scylla and Charybdis. In fact, there is no middle passage of safety there. They will probably give it a wide berth for the future.

Let me now give you as succinctly as I can a detail of the late events in Lousiana.

General Banks, commander of the Federal department of the Gulf, on finding that his autumn and winter campaign on our coast was likely to be barren of any useful results, withdrew and inaugurated a heavy campaign on our north-eastern frontier. He however kept a large force in our front, with which by various movements, threatenings, &c., he thought to keep General Magruder so interested as to prevent his sending any forces to Louisiana. He as quietly as he could withdrew some 10,000 men from his various camps on the Texas coast to New Orleans. These, with some 5,000 more in that city and at Port Hudson, constituted his army. General Sherman's force had just returned from his successful raid on Meridian to Vicksburg. And of these 10,000 men under General A. J. Smith were secured to aid in the onslaught on Shreveport. Commodore Porter's fleet, embracing several ironclads and wooden gunboats, upwards of twenty in all, was engaged to cooperate. But besides this, General Steele's army of 10,000 men at Little Rock (Arkansas) was to march southward by a simultaneous movement, to be joined en route by Blount's army at Fort Smith (Arkansas) under General Thayer. This junction was actually effected, giving Steele some 15,000 men. The plan was for all these forces to move swiftly upon Shreveport and capture it before the Confederates could concentrate, and then with a united army of 40,000 men—my estimates are fully 15,000 below those of General Kirby Smith—to proceed to Northern Texas, fight the Confederate army and scatter it. Having thus subjected the Trans-Mississippi Department, Banks was to go to the aid of Grant east of the river, and close up the rebellion with a grand flourish. This was the programme without doubt. It was a fascinating plan. To all appearance, in Banks's carpeted head-quarters at New Orleans there was no chance of failure. Already he felt the chaplet of victory upon his brow and saw himself a conqueror.

But Kirby Smith was all this time watching him; so was Magruder, one of the greatest generals me judice of this war; so was Dick Taylor, a real chip of the old block (Zachary); so was Green, famous for his feeling the enemy by fighting them. Whilst Banks's vanity imagined he was amusing Magruder on the coast of Texas, Magruder saw all his motions, and had his army placed in light marching order. Whilst it was presumed that Kirby Smith was administering public affairs as was his wont, he was quietly gathering his scattered forces and maturing his plan to resist the invasion.

The Federal General A. J. Smith, with his ten thousand, left Vicksburg on March 12. Banks, with his fifteen (perhaps twenty) thousand, left New Orleans about the same time. Steele began his advance from Little Rock, and Thayer his from Fort Smith. Fort De Russy and Alexandria fell an easy prey to A. J. Smith. Banks joined Smith at Alexandria. They marched on to Natchitoches, the Confederates offering no resistance.

Meanwhile Magruder's army was tramping on over the wide expanse of territory to meet them. The scattered regiments in Louisiana were also gathering in. It was the plan, as I believe, of General Kirby Smith to draw both Banks and Steele to points within ten miles of Shreveport, and then, joining his entire forces—those under Price in Arkansas, those in Louisiana, and those from Texas—fall upon Banks first and whip him, and then, turning immediately upon Steele, put him to rout before he could do any mischief. He presumed that Banks was enough of a general to keep his army together. But he was mistaken. Advancing from Natchitoches, Banks, with the 13th Army Corps under General T. E. G. Ransom, was leading the way; the cavalry of Lee, some five thousand strong, being along with Ransom, while the 19th Corps was some ten miles in the rear, and the 16th and 17th (General A. J. Smith) some fifteen miles further off at Pleasant Hill. General Dick Taylor, who was at Mansfield in command of the Confederate forces, saw the opportunity, and on the morning of the 8th despatched to General Kirby Smith an account of the position, with the information that he should attack the enemy at once. Skirmishing began that morning, and by 4 P.M. the battle had become general, which in an hour's time was practically won by the enemy retreating. By 9 P.M. the retreat became a rout, and whilst our army was resting for the night, the enemy kept up its flight, falling back successively on the 19th, the 16th, and the 17th Corps at Pleasant Hill. Here they made a stand. But the battle of the 8th had cowed them. On the 9th our forces came up with them and fought again, the enemy then outnumbering them two to one. The battle was fiercely contested, and was not decisive. The next morning, however, found the enemy retreating and our cavalry pursuing with all speed. The pursuit continued day by day, first to Grand Ecore, near Natchitoches and then to Alexandria, where Banks now is, with the following net loss:—Killed, 1,500; wounded, 7,500; prisoners, over 4,000; cannon, 33; small arms, over 10,000; wagons, 500; gunboats, 4; transports, 5.

It may be asked why was he allowed to escape? First, because he had more men than the Confederates, and we could not surround him; and secondly, because General Steele with his army required attention.

Steele had meanwhile advanced to the Little Missouri River, a branch of the Washita, about fifty miles from Shreveport. Here he was kept in check by Price until after the battles of Mansfield and Pleasant Hill, when Price was reinforced by about six thousand infantry from the army below. Steele, learning how matters had turned out with Banks, sheered off in an easterly direction to Camden. His army was without food, and it was necessary to forage. He sent out 300 wagons for this purpose, guarded by six pieces of artillery and a force of 1,500 infantry. This force was captured almost entire by the Confederates. Reaching Camden he sent 400 more of his wagons, under guard of 1,000 men, to Pine Bluff. Price learning this sent Fagan, who made a detour around Steele's army, fell upon the train, and captured it.

Steele now attempted to retreat. He fell back on Princeton, and thence on the Sabine River. Here a desperate battle was fought on the 30th of April, which was a success on both sides, since Steele got across the swollen river and destroyed his pontoons, leaving it impossible for us to follow him, while we held the battle-ground, having captured some of his artillery, 2,000 small arms, and 200 wagons. Steele's net loss in his advance to Shreveport has been as follows:—Killed, 1,700; wounded, 5,500; prisoners, 1,800; cannon, 10; small arms, 4,000; wagons, 1,000.

Thus has ended this much-talked-of campaign. The entire force of Confederates actually engaged against the Federals has been under 25,000. These 25,000 have put to rout double their number, killing, wounding, and capturing considerably more than their own numbers. I remarked above that General Kirby Smith believed the enemy's force to be much larger than I have given it. It was so reported, and quite likely with truth. General Smith's sources of information are better than those of any one else. The basis of my estimates are mainly the statements of Federal correspondents to the Northern press, with the exception of the Arkansas army, which was given by them at 30,000. I cannot believe that, however.

The results of these victories cannot yet be told. Speculation upon them would be vain. I think, however, that they have been the most decisive of the war, and look to see the whole Federal campaign for 1864 materially affected by them. Their effect upon our own armies is striking. We had less than 25,000 muskets to meet this invasion. Our army in this department is now larger than it was before these battles began. We have lost, undoubtedly, many men, not less probably in all than 5,000 in killed and wounded. But we have gained in prestige and in conquest vastly. We have saved Texas from invasion, and saved the armies of Lee and Johnston from having those of Banks, A. J. Smith, and Steele to fight this year.

Were my letter not already too long, I would say something of the condition of Texas and its future prospects, but I am admonished to reserve that for another time.

NAVAL PRIZES IN BRITISH WATERS.

Downing Street, June 2.

Sir,—I think it well to communicate to you the decisions at which Her Majesty's Government have arrived on certain questions which have arisen respecting the treatment of prizes captured by Federal or Confederate cruisers if brought into British waters.

1. If any prize captured by a ship-of-war of either of the belligerent Powers shall be brought by the captors within Her Majesty's jurisdiction, notice shall be given by the governor to the captors immediately to depart and remove such prize.

2. A vessel which shall have been actually and bonâ fide converted into, and used as, a public vessel of war, shall not be deemed to be a prize, within the meaning of these rules.

3. If any prize shall be brought within Her Majesty's jurisdiction through mere stress of weather, or other extreme and unavoidable necessity, the governor may allow for her removal such time as he may consider to be necessary.

4. If any prize shall not be removed at the time prescribed to the captors by the governor, the governor may detain such prize until Her Majesty's pleasure shall be made known.

5. If any prize shall have been captured by any violation of the territory or territorial waters of Her Majesty, the governor may detain such prize until her Majesty's pleasure shall be made known.

Her Majesty's Government have not thought it necessary to make any addition to the instructions already given with respect to cargoes, viz., that Her Majesty's orders apply as much to prize cargoes of every kind which may be brought by any armed ships or privateers of either belligerent into British waters as to the captured vessels themselves. They do not, however, apply to any articles which may have formed part of any such cargoes if brought within British jurisdiction, not by armed ships or privateers of either belligerent, but by other persons who may have acquired or may claim property in them by reason of any dealings with the captors.

These rules are for the guidance of the executive authority, and are not intended to interfere in any way with the process of any court of justice.—I have, &c.,

(Signed) Edward Cardwell.

CONFEDERATE CRUISERS AND THEIR PRIZES.

CAPTAIN SEMMES has addressed the following to the Times as a reply 'to numerous assaults upon him by the English Press, on the subject of his destroying prizes at sea without adjudication by a Prize Court':—

THE REASONS WHY CONFEDERATE CRUISERS BURN THEIR PRIZES, AND THE REMEDY.

Confederate States' Steamer Alabama, on the High Seas, April, 1864.

I had the honour to command the first vessel of war (the steamer Sumter) commissioned by the Confederate States in the present war, and, having successfully run the blockade of New Orleans and got to sea, it early became necessary for me to adopt some mode of disposing of my prizes. A blockade of the entire coasts of the Confederate States had already been declared, and the enemy was busy in collecting and arming ships to enforce it; and I presumed that in the course of a few months the blockade would be at least sufficient to keep out sail vessels, and of this class, with rare exceptions, it was probable my prizes would be. It was clear, therefore, that I should be effectually prevented from sending my prizes into the Confederate ports. Up to the time of my running the blockade (June 30, 1861) I had not seen Her Britannic Majesty's Orders in Council prohibiting the belligerents from bringing their prizes into British ports; and looking to the unequal operation of such orders I had strong hopes that none such would be issued. I made my first prizes on the coast of Cuba, and with a view to test the disposition of Spain in this matter I sent them—seven in number—into the port of Cienfuegos. Their arrival was telegraphed to the Captain-General at Havannah. The Captain-General was without instructions, the orders of neutrality of the Queen of Spain not yet having been received. The prizes were permitted to remain until these orders should arrive. The orders came, and the prizes were afterwards illegally handed over to the enemy, instead of being warned to depart. Spain, as well as France, had followed the lead of Great Britain, and in due time all the smaller commercial nations did the same. To show the objects I had in view in sending in these prizes, I quote below an extract from my letter to the Governor of Cienfuegos:—

'The cargoes of several of these vessels are claimed, as appears by certificates found among the papers, as Spanish property. This fact cannot, of course, be verified except by a judicial proceeding in the Prize Courts of the Confederate States. But while this fact is being determined, what is to be done with the property? I have the right to destroy the vessels, but not the cargoes, in case the latter should prove to be, as claimed, Spanish property; but how can I destroy the former and not the latter? I cannot before sentence unlade the cargoes and deliver them to the claimants, for I do not know that the claims will be sustained; and I cannot destroy the cargoes, for I do not know that the claims will not be sustained. Indeed, one of the motives which influenced me in seeking a Spanish port was the fact that these cargoes were claimed by Spanish subjects, whom I am desirous of putting to as little inconvenience as possible in the unlading and reception of their property after sentence, in case it should be restored to them.'

It will thus be seen that I was not only anxious to condemn my prizes, but to put neutrals to as little inconvenience as possible. If my prizes had been received into neutral ports, and permitted to remain there until they could be adjudicated by our Prize Courts, sitting in our own territory, no possible inconvenience that I can perceive could have resulted to neutral nations, and the rights of every one would have been secured—the right of the captor to the full benefit of his prize, and the right of the neutral claimant to adjudication. What inconvenience to Great Britain, for example, could possibly have grown out of the fact of a captured vessel lying quietly at her dock in the port of Liverpool in charge of a ship-keeper and prize agent until she could be adjudicated; and if she should be condemned, why could not she have been sold as quietly at public auction as if she had been seized and sold under an execution for debt? It was my intention to follow the precedent set in the Cienfuegos case—of sending all my prizes into the most convenient ports for the parties concerned; as, where there were English claimants, into English ports; French claimants, into French ports, &c.; but this intention was frustrated, as has been seen, by the orders of the Queen's Government—I say the Queen's Government, because that Government gave the cue which was followed by all the other nations. By these orders I was deprived at the same time of the right of asylum and sale of my prizes, and of the power of adjudication. What course was expected of me under these circumstances? Was it expected that I would abandon the right of capture altogether? or that I would be guilty of the child's play of capturing the enemy's ships with one hand and releasing them with the other? that, in short, I would retire from the high seas, and leave the enemy to pursue his commerce, his 'innocent and peaceable commerce,' as Mr. Adams plaintively and naïvely calls it, without molestation? If you did not suppose this—and I will not impute such folly to a people who not only know the value of commerce to a belligerent, but who have always annihilated the commerce of their enemies in their own wars—you must have known that I would destroy the enemy's ships in every case where it was possible. Why, then, do you complain of the course I pursued? Was it just to force that course upon me, and then exclaim against it in pious horror? Is this the kind of 'fair play' upon which Englishmen pride themselves?

But your neutrality, you say, compelled you to this course. Let us see how that is. What is neutrality? Impartiality. Impartiality in form or appearance merely, or impartiality in substance? When a nation is called upon in good faith to perform that most solemn act of declaring her impartiality between two belligerents, is a mere jugglery of words all that is necessary, or must she look at the practical consequences of the rule she adopts? To this query there would seem to be but one answer. The rule must not only speak in the language of justice, but it must work out the ends of justice. Otherwise it is a sham and a deceit. Let us test the orders of British neutrality by this canon. On their face nothing could be more fair. Whatever is ordained as to the one belligerent is ordained as to the other. The prizes of both belligerents are prohibited from entering British waters. But when these orders were penned what facts and what consequences were in the mind of the Minister? Did he or did he not know that he was dealing a staggering blow at the Confederate States at the same time that he was playing directly into the hand of the Federal States? Let us see. It will be admitted that the two belligerents had the right to use against each other all the modes of warfare recognised by the international code, and that no nation had the right to prohibit to either of them the use of any of those modes. Privateering was one of those modes, and the circumstances of the two parties to the war were such that this mode of offence was peculiarly valuable to the Confederate States. The Federal States had a large commerce and a very respectable navy, they having retained possession of all the ships of war of the old service, while the Confederate States had little or no commerce, and were just beginning to improvise a navy. (And here it may not be out of place to mention a fact highly creditable to the parties concerned:—Every ship of war in the command of a Southern naval officer at the date of the secession of his State was duly handed over to the Federal Government before the officer resigned his commission and returned to his State. A large proportion of the wealth of the Federal States consisted in their commerce, and if this could be destroyed an important blow would be struck in the war. The 'Volunteer Corps' of the sea—as legitimate as the 'Volunteer Corps' of the land—was the most effective weapon with which to strike this blow, and, accordingly, in the first days of the war several privateers were commissioned, and others were being rapidly fitted out when the Queen's orders appeared and knocked the whole scheme on the head. As if by magic, the privateers which had already been commissioned disappeared from the seas, and all work was suspended on those in course of preparation, and the little Sumter, afterwards assisted by two or three other small vessels, was obliged to undertake the Herculean task of destroying a commerce second only to that of Great Britain, and which covered every sea. The reason of the disappearance of these private armed ships is obvious. They are prepared at the cost of individuals, and depend wholly upon their captures for success. If these cannot be made available the enterprise becomes abortive, and the capital invested in it is sunk; and they could not be made available by reason of the Queen's orders referred to denying them the right of asylum in British ports, the British Foreign Secretary well knowing that they could not be made available in the Confederate ports because of the blockade, the blockade having been proclaimed on April 18, 1861, and the orders in Council not having been issued until June 1 following. So far as results were concerned the British Government might as well have said to the Confederate States, in the words of the 'Declaration' of Paris, 'Privateering is and remains abolished,' although the said States were not bound by the said declaration, the United States, then the Federal mouthpiece, having declined to accede thereto before the war.

There was no occasion for Mr. Seward to endeavour to 'sneak' into this 'declaration,' after the war, in the hope that by becoming a party to it Great Britain would illogically hold that the Confederate States, now acknowledged as belligerents, would be bound by the act of their enemy. The British Foreign Secretary knew his business better than this. With the most commendable sagacity he took care of his logic and of his friend Mr. Seward at the same time, and accomplished the object of the Federal Government by his orders in Council, without permitting its Minister to humiliate himself.

This was one result of the declaration of neutrality—Anglicè partiality—put forth by Great Britain. But the mischief did not end here. The Confederate States being compelled to restrict their operations upon the high seas to their ships of war, those ships were also seriously embarrassed by this declaration. Their inability to adjudicate their prizes has already been referred to. As a consequence of this inability they could make no beneficial use of them. Not only so, they were compelled in many instances to release them on ransom bond for the benefit of neutrals—that is to say, to give neutral claimants of cargoes an opportunity after the war, when the bonds should be sued upon, to vindicate their claims in a court of justice, which opportunity their own Governments had denied to them during the war by rendering it impossible for them to go before a Confederate Prize Court. The release of these vessels operated strongly, too, in favour of the enemy. For it amounted to a loan to him of so much property, of which he had been rightfully deprived, with which to carry on the war; his bonds, in the meantime, being of no use to the captors, as it was impossible to collect them until after the war. This double mischief, therefore, ensued in these bond cases—the enemy continued to carry on his commerce, and commerce to a belligerent is strength; while the captor's means, quoad the war, were not increased by his captures. The reader will now see why as few of these ships as possible were released on bond, the release being confined to those cases in which an apparent bonâ fide neutral claim was presented on the face of properly prepared papers. Nevertheless, to show the good faith with which the captor must have acted towards neutrals in this matter, every ship destroyed by him was so much property destroyed against his own interest; for the ship being destroyed, no prize-money could be realised, whereas the bond would be valuable to him at the end of the war. And although it was to be presumed that every officer would, from a sense of duty, destroy as many of his prizes as possible, yet we see that at least he had no private interest to urge him to destroy them when there was a question of neutral rights, his leaning being, in fact, the other way.

This, then, is the working of those British orders in Council which, on the face of them, appear to be entirely unexceptionable. Stripping off the diplomatic disguise of language—which is so thin and transparent that the wonder is that it should have been resorted to at all with the hope of concealment—more unjust, oppressive, and unneutral orders could not have been devised. If the practical effect of these orders is such as I have stated, what excuse can be offered for adopting them? Can it be said that no other course was open to the British Government under the laws of nations? If so, that would be a sufficient excuse; for where a Government has no alternative it would certainly be unjust to hold it responsible for all the consequential damages of its acts. It might be said with truth, in reply to our complaints, 'We were obliged, under the laws of nations, regulating and controlling our neutrality, to exclude your prizes from our ports; and if, by reason of your inferior naval force, and the consequent blockade of your ports, the rule operates more harshly upon you than upon the enemy, that is your misfortune, not our fault.' But the fact is, there is no such excuse to offer. It was, at least, equally as open to Great Britain to admit as to exclude our prizes, as I will now proceed to show. The practice of nations has been various on this point, and it rests in the discretion of each nation to admit prizes into its ports or to exclude them, as it may think fit. This seems to be the general understanding of the law on this question, although there is very respectable authority for the opinion that a nation cannot lawfully exclude the prizes of a belligerent without previous treaty stipulations to that effect. —Loccenius de Jure Maritimo, l. 2, c. 4, s. 7. As a general rule, belligerent nations have not favoured the carrying of their prizes into neutral ports, and the reasons are obvious. It is more convenient for the Prize Courts that they should have the actual custody of the prize to be adjudicated. And the bringing in of prizes to the home ports gives the subjects of the captor an opportunity of dealing in prize property, an object of no small importance in a maritime war where many valuable captures are made. It gives the Government, too, the advantage of buying in such ships as it may wish to equip for the purposes of war, an advantage of which the Federal States have frequently availed themselves during the present war. Hence, belligerent nations have generally required their cruisers to bring their prizes into the home ports. Still, in cases where the contrary practice was convenient, nations have freely availed themselves of it, without let or hindrance from neutrals, unless there was a treaty in the way. In former wars in which Great Britain has been concerned, Leghorn and Lisbon were frequently made use of for this purpose; the prizes being condemned and sold without ever reaching the home ports at all. But taking the modern practice to be for the neutral to admit or exclude prizes at pleasure, the presumption always is, previous to the issue by the neutral of any order on the subject, in favour of the admission—this having been the more common practice. On this point see Wheaton's Elements (Lawrence), p. 498; see also 3 Phillimore's International Law, p. 467, sec. 363. The treaties between nations on this subject have been as various as the practice. In 1778 a treaty was entered into between France and the United States, whereby no ship of the enemy of either party was allowed to sell her prize, or discharge her cargo, or buy more provisions than immediately indispensable, in the ports of the other.

In 1800 a similar treaty was entered into by the same parties.

In 1794 a treaty of exclusion was made between England and the United States.

In 1806 a treaty was made between the same parties, containing similar provisions.

In 1782 a treaty was entered into between the United States and Holland, then one of the principal maritime Powers, whereby the sale of prizes brought by either party into the ports of the other was legalised.

In 1742 a treaty was made between Spain and Denmark authorising the reception and sale of prizes reciprocally; and so late as 1829 a treaty was ratified between Holland and the Republic of Colombia authorising the reception of prizes into each other's ports.

Now, if the treaties between Great Britain and the United States were still in existence, there is no doubt that Great Britain would be obliged under those treaties to apply the rule of exclusion to the Confederate States; but it will be remembered that a war occurred between the two contracting parties in 1812, subsequently to the formation of those treaties, which abrogated them; and the subject has not since been renewed either in the Treaty of Ghent, which put an end to that war, or in any subsequent treaty. The ignoring of such a question, after it had once been made the subject of a treaty, places in a very strong light the intention of the parties to remain perfectly free to exercise their discretion for the future. Great Britain, then, has no excuse for the unjust and unneutral course she has pursued. She can neither affirm that she had no alternative under the laws of nations, nor that she was bound by any treaty obligation.

One more question, which has already been incidentally noticed, remains to be disposed of. If Great Britain had permitted the entry of prizes into her ports, would this have enabled the captors to condemn them so as to give an indefeasible title to the purchaser? Without doubt. Notwithstanding Lord Stowell, in the case of the Flad Oyen (1 Rob., pp. 139–142), declared the practice (he was commenting on the practice of the French courts, in the heat of a French war, and every lawyer knows the vim with which his Lordship assailed everything French) to be 'infrequent and irregular,' it is now well settled that a belligerent prize court, sitting in its own country, may adjudicate a prize lying in neutral waters, provided the possession of the captor remains. And this position seems to be as unanswerable in principle as it is well settled in practice. The proceeding in a prize case is in rem, and to give the court jurisdiction it is only necessary that it should have possession of the prize. But this need not be actual possession by the officers of the court, as by the marshal and his bailiffs. It is sufficient if the captor, or his duly appointed agent, has possession, because his possession is that of the Government under whose authority the court sits, as effectually as would be that of the marshal; and no principle is better settled than that a neutral Government has no right to interfere with the captor's possession of his prize—the only case excepted of the capture having been made within the waters of the neutral territory. So that if the prize be admitted into the neutral port at all—and the argument proceeds upon that hypothesis—the captor's possession remains as firmly established as if he and his prize were in his own country. In support of this jurisdiction of the Prize Court I quote the following authorities:—In 111 Phillimore's International Law, p. 482, it is said:—'An attentive review of all the cases decided in the Courts of England and the North American United States during the last war (1812) leads to the conclusion that the condemnation of a capture by a regular Prize Court, sitting in the country of the belligerent, of a prize lying at the time of the sentence in a neutral port is irregular, but clearly valid. In appears to be the inclination of the English Prize Court, during the present war (Russian) to limit to cases of necessity the condemnation of vessels lying in a neutral port. It is scarcely necessary to add, after what has been said as to the former French law on condemnations by judges of the belligerent in neutral ports (that is, the judge, and the prize both being in the neutral port) that such condemnations of vessels lying in neutral ports are holden valid by the French Prize Courts' Again, in the volume already quoted, p. 426, it is said, 'The courts of the North American United States allow that property may be condemned in the courts of the captor while lying in a neutral country, but still they rightly hold that it can only be so adjudicated upon while the possession of the captor remains; for if it be divested, either in fact or by operation of law, that possession is gone which can alone sustain the jurisdiction. And it is to be observed that, à fortiori, where the property is already in the custody of a neutral tribunal, and the title is there sub judice, no other foreign court can by any adjudication of its own rightfully take away, forestall, or defeat the jurisdiction of this neutral tribunal;' and the author quotes 7, Wheaton's Reports, 356. It thus appears that, unless the captor divests himself of the possession of the prize (as by sale, without waiting for condemnation), or his possession is divested by operation of law (as by his bringing a prize captured within neutral waters within neutral jurisdiction), the belligerent Prize Court, sitting in its own country, has ample power to adjudicate.

There would seem, then, to be no difficulty in the way of Great Britain's revoking her unjust and unneutral orders in Council and returning to a sense of justice. If individuals are bound in conscience to retract their errors when once discovered, how much more are nations bound to do so, the consequences of whose errors are so much more widely spread? By doing justice to the Confederate States Great Britain will not be doing injustice to the Federal States. If she gives an asylum in her ports to the former, she will equally give it to the latter; and if this should work an incidental advantage to the Confederate States, why should this be objected to more than the opposite rule, which has worked them so many disadvantages? And will it be less graceful in Great Britain to perform this act of justice because one of the parties in the forum is struggling against odds, while the other has become overbearing, nay, truculent and defiant, from a fancied excess of brute strength? It is never safe for a nation, any more than an individual, to temporise, especially with a bully, and at the cost of injustice to a weaker party. Great Britain innocently fancies that she is 'laying up against a rainy day'—that is to say, that she is conciliating the 'universal Yankee nation' by her present one-sided course, and establishing wise and safe precedents to be followed by that people hereafter when she shall herself become a belligerent. But I warn her that it is all fancy, and that she will reap the reward of her timidity in the usual way—timidity on the part of nations always inviting further insult and outrage. A people who have become so lunatic as to destroy a constitutional Government and voluntarily submit their necks to the yoke of a coarse and illiterate tyrant for the sake of butchering, in gratification of their revenge, eight millions of their former fellow-citizens, will hardly permit themselves to be ruled by English precedents, to be calmly quoted to them by some future, peace-loving Earl Russell from ponderous blue books.

THE DEATH-BED OF GENERAL STUART.

(From the Richmond Examiner.)

No incident of mortality since the fall of the great Jackson has occasioned more painful regret than this. Major-General J. E. B. Stuart, the model of Virginian cavaliers and dashing chieftains, whose name was a terror to the enemy, and familiar as a household word in two continents, is dead, struck down by a bullet from the foe, and the whole Confederacy mourns him. He breathed out his gallant spirit resignedly, and in the full possession of all his remarkable faculties of mind and body, at twenty-two minutes to eight o'clock, Thursday night, at the residence of Dr. Brewer, a relative, in Green Street, in the presence of Drs. Brewer, Garnett, Gibson, and Fontaine, of the General's staff, Rev. Messrs. Peterkin and Kepler, and a circle of sorrow-stricken comrades and friends.

We learn from the physicians in attendance upon the General that his condition during the day was very changeable, with occasional delirium and other unmistakable symptoms of speedy dissolution. In the passing moments of delirium the gallant General reviewed in broken sentences all his glorious campaigns around M'Clellan's rear on the peninsula, beyond the Potomac, and upon the Rapidan, quoting from his orders, and issuing new ones to his couriers, with a last injunction to 'make haste.'

About noon, Thursday, President Davis visited his bedside, and spent some fifteen minutes in the dying chamber of his favourite chieftain. The President, taking his hand, said, 'General, how do you feel?' He replied, 'Easy, but willing to die, if God and my country think I have fulfilled my destiny and done my duty.' As evening approached, the General's delirium increased, and his mind again wandered to the battle-fields over which he had fought, then to wife and children, and again to the front. A telegraphic message had been sent for his wife, who was in the country, with the injunction to make all haste, as the General was dangerously wounded.

As evening wore on the paroxysms of pain increased, and mortification set in rapidly. Though suffering the greatest agony at times, the General was calm, and applied to the wound, with his own hand, the ice intended to relieve the pain. During the evening he asked Dr. Brewer how long he thought he could live, and whether it was possible for him to survive through the night. The doctor, knowing he did not desire to be buoyed by false hopes, told him frankly that death, the last enemy, was rapidly approaching. The General nodded, and said, 'I am resigned if it be God's will; but I would like to live to see my wife. But God's will be done.' Several times he roused up and asked if she had come.

To the doctor, who sat holding his wrist, and counting the fleeting, weakening pulse, he remarked, 'Doctor, I suppose I am going fast now. It will soon be over. But God's will be done. I hope I have fulfilled my destiny to my country and my duty to my God.'

At half-past seven o'clock it was evident to the physicians that death was setting its clammy seal upon the brave, open brow of the General, and they told him so—asking if he had any last message to give. The General, with a mind perfectly clear and possessed, then made disposition of his staff and personal effects. To Mrs. General R. E. Lee he directed that the golden spurs be given as a dying memento of his love and esteem for her husband. To his staff officers he gave his horses. So particular was he in small things, even in the dying hour, that he emphatically exhibited the ruling passion strong in death. To one of his staff, who was a heavy-built man, he said, 'You had better take the larger horse; he will carry you better.' Other mementoes he disposed of in a similar manner. To his young son he left his glorious sword.

His worldly matters closed, the eternal interests of his soul engaged his mind. Turning to the Rev. Mr. Peterkin, of the Episcopal Church, and of which he was an exemplary member, he asked him to sing the hymn commencing

> Rock of ages cleft for me,
> Let me hide myself in thee.

He joined in with all the voice his strength would permit. He then joined in prayer with the ministers. To the doctor he again said, 'I am going fast now. I am resigned. God's will be done.' Thus died General J. E. B. Stuart.

ANOTHER ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—Mr. F. C. Hall, the Arctic explorer who was among the Esquimaux in 1860, 1861, and 1862, purposes to start from the United States this month on a second expedition of discovery in the North Polar regions. Mr. Hall brought back with him, from his first voyage, two Esquimaux, a man and a woman, whom he has supported since, and taught something of civilised life. They, with other natives, will be his only companions.

NEGRO EQUALITY.—A Sanitary Fair has lately been held at St. Louis. A negro minister, who is President of the Freedmen's Association in New York, and who had been actively engaged in collecting funds for the Fair, went to St. Louis, accompanied by another negro minister. After some difficulty they found some one—the Rev. Dr. Nelson—to take them to the festive scene, and he conducted his coloured friends to the refreshment saloon known as the Café Laclede, and ordered dinner. The St. Louis Republican of May 26 thus describes the scene that ensued:—'The Café Laclede, we may state, is a leading feature of the Fair, in which thirty or forty of our most respectable matrons and young ladies lend their services to wait upon all who enter and order refreshments. Many of them manifested their indignant and outraged sense by tears, and others by taking their departure on the instant from the place. Mr. Fogg, Mr. Blackman, and other Fair committeemen, remonstrated with Dr. Nelson, and the lady in charge of the refreshment department for the day, sent him a note requesting him to at once move himself and companions. Dr. Nelson at last yielded, and went away, though not until he had received sharp words from one or two of the committeemen, with injunctions to take the negroes to his own house and entertain them. He had some backers in the matter, one of whom was Mr. Truman Woodruff, the City Auditor; but nearly all those who witnessed the incident were ardent in denouncing it as a gross insult to the ladies whose gentle and graceful presence has so constantly adorned that and nearly all other departments of the Fair. The Executive Committee, and all those who compose the responsible directory, owe it to these ladies, to the public, and to themselves, to unite in a card denouncing this affair, and denying Dr. Nelson's officious act in unstinted terms. It is better to punish a few fanatics by making such a publication, than disgust a whole community by omitting to do so. The Fair has gone on well—it was proving an astonishing success. It can be made successful to the end if the Executive Committee will only be true to themselves, true to the holy cause in which they are engaged, by manfully rebuking an insult to the wives and daughters of St. Louis, the parallel of which cannot be found anywhere in this country.'

ALARMING.—The New York Herald of May 30 thus concludes an article on Reform in England: 'The visit of Garibaldi to London was the beacon light which signalised the coming struggle. . . . It requires no gift of prophecy to foretell that the influence of the overbearing aristocracy of England is drawing to a close. They must soon give way before the people they have so long and so arbitrarily ruled.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

The state of the Money Market has been extremely quiet throughout the week. The rate of discount has varied from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., but there is a supply adequate enough to provide for all commercial requirements. The question is, Will the Bank, though it is transacting a limited business, reduce the official minimum now we are so near the end of the quarter? Many people think they will, others that they will not: and, we are bound to say, the majority incline to the latter view. The arrivals of specie from Australia and America have not been large; but at present they are sufficient to allow a balance to be sent into the Bank of England, and more, it is understood, is likely to follow. The operation of the 2,000,000*l.* assistance to Spain will, it is now asserted, assume the character of an exchange transaction; and therefore whatever is withdrawn will hereafter come back in the shape of remittances. A great deal of fuss has been made about this arrangement, and it is believed that it will create very little financial disturbance, especially in the hands of the individuals intrusted with the business. It is curious to notice the little influence a high rate of discount exercises, now it is generally understood trade is sound, and the consequence is no unnecessary apprehension is awakened, notwithstanding it is felt that the organisation of public companies has made, if anything, rather too rapid progress. The supply of capital among the bankers and brokers has the last day or two been increased by receipts of country deposits, but there is no disposition evinced to lower the general terms in the open market. At the Stock Exchange the half-monthly settlements have passed over without the least difficulty. The rates of continuation in foreign securities and miscellaneous shares have been very moderate, showing the cessation of active speculation. On Government stock and Exchequer bills, the terms for advances were lately as high as 6 per cent.; they are now about $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 per cent.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There is no material change to report in the value of this security. Pending a definite result of Grant's campaign in Virginia, the dealings are very limited. We quote 64 to 66 as the closing quotation.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There is not the slightest improvement in the market for American Government and railway securities. The dealings are even on a more restricted scale; but prices remain comparatively steady. The only dealings recorded are in Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, at $72\frac{1}{2}$; ditto, Pennsylvania section, at 73; Illinois Central six per cents., at 76; ditto ditto, \$100 shares, \$90 paid, at 33 and $34\frac{1}{2}$ dis.; ditto ditto, all paid, at 60; and Pennsylvania Railway Bonds, second mortgage, at 83, 84, and 85.

THE SPANISH PASSIVE DEBT.

There was a large meeting of the holders of the Spanish Passive debt, at the London Tavern, on Tuesday, in consequence of a request presented to the Committee by the Spanish Certificate holders, for the purpose of considering the measures necessary to be taken for the protection of their interests, in consequence of the recent extraordinary proceedings of the Spanish Minister of Finance.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the second general meeting of the Ceylon Company, Mr. Lawford Ackland in the chair, the report, which was adopted, showed that the net profit was 30,498*l.*, out of which a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and a bonus of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., amounting together to 10*s.* 6*d.* per share, was recommended, which with the interim dividend would absorb 14,358*l.* A sum of 10,000*l.* was to be added to the reserve fund, and the balance, 6,303*l.*, would be carried forward. The chairman said the result of the Company's operations had been in every way satisfactory; for the first year the profits had been 9 per cent., and for the present year 22 per cent. All the preliminary expenses had been paid, and in order to extend the operations of the Company, it was proposed to issue the 6,200 unallotted shares at a premium of 2*l.* per share; the premiums would raise the reserve fund to 21,000*l.*—At an extraordinary general meeting of the Marine Investment Company the following resolutions were passed:—That the second issue of 10,000 shares in the capital of the Company be made when 6*l.* 5*s.* has been called on the first issue of 10,000 shares in lieu of 12*l.* 10*s.* per share, as stated in the prospectus of the Company, and that a sum at the rate of 5 per cent. on the capital paid up on April 26 last be paid to the members on account of the dividend, to be declared at the first ordinary general meeting.—At the annual meeting of the Assam (Tea) Company, the report, which was adopted, showed a net profit of 64,930*l.*, out of which a dividend of 25 per cent. free of income-tax was declared. The Upper Assam Tea Company has also held an extraordinary general meeting to confirm the increase of capital from 20,000*l.* to 60,000*l.*, and increasing the amount of calls, which are to be made at less intervals. The directors at the same time declared an ad interim dividend of 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital.—At the twelfth ordinary general meeting of the London Chartered Bank of Australia, the report, which was adopted, stated that after the usual deductions, and making allowance for bad and doubtful debts, there remained to the credit of profit and loss the sum of 52,849*l.*, out of which the directors recommended a dividend to be declared for the half-year of 4 per cent., free of income-tax, and that a sum of 5,000*l.* be placed to the reserve fund, leaving to be carried to the next account a balance of 7,849*l.*—At the half-yearly meeting of the Commercial Dock Company, a dividend was declared for the six months at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and at the same rate as the first, second, and third instalments of the new issue, both payable free of income-tax.—At the half-yearly meeting to-day, of the African Steamship Company, the report stated that after making the authorised reserve for depreciation, defraying all expenses of navigating and maintaining the ships, discharging the cost of the inter-colonial service, there remained a balance of 4,965*l.* to the credit of the revenue account, out of which the directors recommended the payment of a dividend of 8*s.* per share free of income-tax, for the half year ending April 30 last, being at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. This payment will absorb 4,403*l.*, and leave 562*l.* to be carried to the next half-yearly account. The report was adopted, and the dividend declared.—At the first annual general meeting of the Imperial Ottoman Bank held to-day, the report of the directors stated that the first operation of magnitude in which the bank was called upon to take part, was the issue of the Turkish loan of 1863. The profits to December 31 include a considerable amount derived from this loan. The accounts to December 31 showed a net profit of 185,680*l.*, or nearly 19 per cent. per annum on the paid-up capital, from which had to be deducted, in accordance with the statutes, first the distribution paid on account in March last at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, amounting to 48,937*l.*; and, secondly, 10 per cent. for the reserve fund. Of the balance, 118,174*l.*, one-tenth was appropriated by the statutes to the founders and administrators of the bank, and the remainder was available on the present occasion. The directors proposed a payment of 15*s.* 9*d.* per share, making, with the interest already paid, a dividend of nearly 16 per cent. per annum. The report was unanimously adopted. The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China have to-day declared a dividend of 10 per cent. free of income-tax for the current half-year. They have also made a call of 7*l.* 10*s.* per share on the new or increased capital of the bank.

Liverpool, Wednesday, June 15. There has been rather more animation in our cotton market during the last few days, the demand having increased, particularly for American of good sorts, and the supply of such being somewhat limited, extreme prices, and in some instances an advance, have been obtained. For other descriptions the enquiry has been rather more moderate, and sales have only been effected at, if anything, a fractional reduction in quotations. The sales this week have been 54,000 bales, of which 20,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year so far have been 1,179,945 bales and to the same period in 1863 951,540 bales. There have been imported this year 982,860 bales, whilst last year the importations were 689,732 bales. The exports this year have amounted to 221,924 bales, and to the corresponding date in 1863, 192,948 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 744,922 bales; last year the number was 504,103 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 199,058 bales; same in 1863, 225,176 bales. At the present time the computed stocks are 297,203 bales, whilst last year they were 385,192 bales. The closing quotations this evening were, for American descriptions, $24\frac{1}{2}$d. to 30*d.*; Pernambuco, 29*d.* to $29\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maranhams, $28\frac{1}{2}$d. to $29\frac{3}{4}$d.; Egyptian, $28\frac{1}{2}$d. to $32\frac{3}{4}$d.; Smyrna, $20\frac{1}{2}$d. to $24\frac{3}{4}$d.; Bengal and Scinde, $13\frac{1}{4}$d. to $13\frac{1}{2}$d., China, $18\frac{1}{2}$d. to $19\frac{1}{2}$d.; and Surats, 10*d.* to $25\frac{1}{2}$d.

The markets at Manchester exhibit an improved condition generally, which is in some degree to be attributed to the firmer state of the Liverpool cotton market, and the necessity in most instances of replenishing reduced stocks. The demand for shipping yarns has been very strong, and a considerable business has taken place, particularly for the better descriptions; but at the same time the common sorts are also looking up, in consequence of the lowness of prices spinners have shown a disposition to accept. The Bolton class of yarns have also been more readily disposed of at improved quotations. There has also been increased enquiry for double yarns, but the prices obtained do not show any improvement. In home-trade yarns only a limited business has been transacted; prices remain very firm for the superior classes, but for the lower counts there is no material alteration. A generally better feeling prevails in the cloth markets; buyers have shown more anxiety to do business, which in some instances has induced offers which have led to transactions taking place; but for the most part manufacturers remain remarkably firm, and some of them have demanded increased prices, which has in some degree curtailed transactions. The Indian mail is said to have brought but few orders, and the more important buyers for that market are doing but very little. Prices are maintained more from the fact that stocks are yet very light, combined with the firmness of the Liverpool market, than from any business doing or any demand for cloths.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Wavmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hotze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

ACTS OF THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1863–1864.

AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

WHEREAS, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilisation, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States; and whereas, the condition of the contest demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, and faithfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence:—

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the exportation of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

SEC. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may impose.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from a proper officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship, boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

SEC. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue and other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

SEC. 6 That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

SEC. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

APPROVED, February 6, 1864.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE,' APPROVED, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I. AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses or rice, shall, before the landing on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail, a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth and of their residence for the preding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and h meward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable dispatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged with a cargo, consisting one half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel, shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quant ty and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo, or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be five pence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton at ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. If the outward bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds of her cargo for account of the Confederate States, the outward freight shall be six pence sterling per pound, and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, her owners may fill up the same on their own account: but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one-third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate and payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and he shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligations of the said bond so far as the same was practicable, and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law, which declares 'that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations, shall be recoverable in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

13 Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately, within a few days.

Approved.

Treasury Department, C. S. A.
RICHMOND, March 16, 1864.

THE following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved February 6, 1864:

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel; and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo, shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the net proceeds of her outward cargo, and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved, March 16, 1864.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits, or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries,' approved May 21, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:— All things for medical purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castille, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval services.

SEC. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; muffs and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, or of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, bedsides, and other portions of carpeting, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cider and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds; fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other floor matting and mats made of flags, jute, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread lacings and insertings; velvets of all kinds.

SEC. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges; cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, mosaics, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery; leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E. Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

SEC. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to articles of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

SEC. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. If any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

SEC. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate States after said first day of March next, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

SEC. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.'

SEC. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;' and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrict ons as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned.'

SEC. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

THE ALABAMA.

THE following official report of Captain Semmes of the naval engagement off Cherbourg between the Alabama and the Kearsage has been sent to us for publication:—

Southampton, June 21, 1864.

SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that, in accordance with my intention as previously announced to you, I steamed out of the harbour of Cherbourg between nine and ten o'clock on the morning of June 19, for the purpose of engaging the enemy's steamer Kearsage, which had been lying off and on the port for several days previously. After clearing the harbour we descried the enemy with his head off shore, at a distance of about nine miles. We were three-quarters of an hour in coming up with him. I had previously pivoted my guns to starboard, and made all my preparations for engaging the enemy on that side. When within about a mile and a quarter of the enemy, he suddenly wheeled, and, bringing his head in shore, presented his starboard battery to me. By this time we were distant about one mile from each other, when I opened on him with solid shot, to which he replied in a few minutes, and the engagement became active on both sides.

The enemy now pressed his ship under a full head of steam, and to prevent our passing each other too speedily, and to keep our respective broadsides bearing, it became necessary to fight in a circle; the two ships steaming around a common centre, and preserving a distance from each other of from a quarter to half a mile. When we got within good shell range, we opened upon him with shell. Some ten or fifteen minutes after the commencement of the action, our spanker gaff was shot away, and our ensign came down by the run. This was immediately replaced by another at the mizenmasthead. The firing now became very hot, and the enemy's shot and shell soon began to tell upon our hull—knocking down, killing, and disabling a number of men in different parts of the ship. Perceiving that our shell, though apparently exploding against the enemy's sides, were doing but little damage, I returned to solid shot firing, and from this time onward alternated with shot and shell.

After the lapse of about one hour and ten minutes, our ship was ascertained to be in a sinking condition, the enemy's shell having exploded in our sides and between decks, opening large apertures, through which the water rushed with great rapidity.

For some few minutes I had hopes of being able to reach the French coast, for which purpose I gave the ship all steam, and set such of the fore and aft sails as were available. The ship filled so rapidly, however, that before we had made much progress the fires were extinguished in the furnaces, and we were evidently on the point of sinking. I now hauled down my colours to prevent the further destruction of life, and despatched a boat to inform the enemy of our condition.

Although we were now but 400 yards from each other, the enemy fired upon me five times after my colours had been struck, dangerously wounding several of my men. It is charitable to suppose that a ship of war of a Christian nation could not have done this intentionally.

We now turned all our exertions towards the wounded, and such of the boys of the ship as were unable to swim. These were despatched in my quarter-boats, the only boats remaining to me; the waist-boats having been torn to pieces.

Some twenty minutes after my furnace fires had been extinguished, and the ship being on the point of settling, every man, in obedience to a previous order which had been given to the crew, jumped overboard and endeavoured to save himself.

There was no appearance of any boat coming to me from the enemy until after the ship went down. Fortunately, however, the steam yacht Deerhound, owned by a gentleman of Lancashire, England, Mr. John Lancaster, who was himself on board, steamed up in the midst of my drowning men, and rescued a number of both officers and men from the water. I was fortunate enough myself thus to escape to the shelter of the neutral flag, together with about forty others, all told.

About this time the Kearsage sent one, and then tardily another boat.

Accompanying you will find lists of the killed and wounded, and of those who were picked up by the Deerhound. The remainder, there is reason to hope, were picked up by the enemy and by a couple of French pilot boats, which were also fortunately near the scene of action.

At the end of the engagement it was discovered by those of our officers who went alongside the enemy's ship with the wounded that her midship section on both sides was thoroughly iron-coated; this having been done with chains constructed for the purpose, placed perpendicularly from the rail to the water's edge—the whole covered over by a thin outer planking, which gave no indication of the armour beneath.

This planking had been ripped off in every direction by our shot and shell, the chain broken and indented in many places, and forced partly into the ship's side. She was most effectually guarded, however, in this section from penetration. The enemy was much damaged in other parts, but to what extent it is now impossible to tell; it is believed he was badly crippled.

My officers and men behaved steadily and gallantly, and though they have lost their ship they have not lost honour.

Where all behaved so well, it would be invidious to particularise; but I cannot deny myself the pleasure of saying that Mr. Kell, my First Lieutenant, deserves great credit for the fine condition in which the ship went into action, with regard to her battery, magazine, and shell-rooms; also that he rendered me great assistance by his coolness and judgment as the fight proceeded.

The enemy was heavier than myself both in ship, battery, and crew, but I did not know, until the action was over, that she was also ironclad.

Our total loss in killed and wounded is thirty—to wit, nine killed and twenty-one wounded.

I have the honour to be, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) R. SEMMES, Captain.

The subjoined account will be read with interest:—

The Confederate ship of war Alabama, Captain Semmes, arrived at Cherbourg on June 11. She was greatly in need of repair after the prolonged series of cruises extending over a period of nearly two years, but no permission to repair in the French port was given her. Had such permission been granted, it is probable that we should not have to record the following events. Within two days after her arrival, the United States corvette Kearsage, Captain Winslow, appeared off the Breakwater, and continued to hover on and off the coast till Sunday, June 19. On Thursday, June 16, Captain Semmes entertained a large party on board the Alabama, and displayed to his visitors his boarding hatchets and sabres. He intrusted to the Brazilian Consul all his gold, his papers, his forty-five chronometers, the bonds executed by ransomed ships, and his will. He handed his journal into the keeping of an English gentleman. At eight o'clock on the morning of Sunday, June 19, Captain Semmes assembled his crew, and in a fervid oration announced that the time had arrived for them to conquer or die. His speech was received with rounds of cheers for the South, for Lee and his army, and for hospitable France. Captain Semmes then referred to his recent letter on naval belligerent rights, and concluded his speech by saying that 'that document had been drawn up in order that the truth might be known in case he should perish.' At 10.30 A.M. the Alabama steamed out of the harbour in view of a vast multitude of people who lined the piers and every spot whence a view could be obtained, and cheered the gallant ship with wild enthusiasm. Directly she had cleared the harbour she was joined by the English yacht Deerhound, the property of Mr. John Lancaster, of Hindley Hall, Wigan, Lancashire, and also by the French war frigate Couronne. The latter vessel followed her to the distance of one league from the shore, and there stopped. The Alabama then descried the Kearsage lying about ten miles N.E. by E. of the harbour, and bore down upon her. In about an hour she got within one mile of her adversary, and made an attempt to board her. The Kearsage was, however, too quick for her, and the Alabama then opened fire from her starboard battery. The Kearsage replied from her starboard guns, and a vigorous fire at once began, both vessels steaming in circles round a common centre and fighting their starboard batteries. The Kearsage threw shells from her 11-inch columbiads, and the Alabama threw shot and shell alternately. The shells from the Kearsage did terrific execution on the Alabama, rending her hull, and killing and wounding several of her crew. The practice of the Alabama was magnificent, and her firing more rapid than that of her adversary. But the Kearsage was protected by iron cables, skilfully arranged to hang from her deck between her fore and mainmast. Over the cables was an outer shield of timber, and though the shells tore open the timber and drove the iron into the sides of the ship, yet her hull was not penetrated. Captain Semmes made a second attempt to board, but a shell from the Kearsage smashed the boiler of the Alabama and paralysed her movements. Her colours were shot away from the mainmast and were then run up at the mizen. After her steam-power had been destroyed, she hoisted foretrysail and jib, and made for the shore. Immediately afterwards she began to heel over, and the water rushed furiously into the ship, the men fighting the guns till the waves dashed into the portholes. Finding all hope of saving the ship gone, Captain Semmes put the wounded into a boat, and sent them off to the Kearsage demanding help. Before any assistance could arrive the word was given for every man to save himself, and all jumped overboard as the gallant ship sank beneath the waves. The Deerhound came to the aid of these as they supported themselves on spars and buckets, and picked up Captain Semmes, thirteen officers, and twenty-seven men. With these she steamed away at full speed to Southampton. The boats of the Kearsage picked up 62 men, and some French pilot-boats picked up nine more. The young English surgeon who was below dressing the wounded went down with the ship. The Deerhound arrived at Southampton late on Sunday night. Captain Semmes, who was slightly wounded in the hand, at once landed, and went with Lieutenant Kell to Kelway's Hotel, while the sailors went to the Home in Canute Road. Not a single relic of the Alabama fell into the hands of her enemy. The Kearsage proceeded to Cherbourg immediately after the fight. She had suffered much, having twelve shots in her hull. The wounded sailors from the Alabama were taken to the Marine Hospital: but there was some risk of a renewal of the fight on shore, and the gendarmerie had to be summoned to keep the peace. Captain Winslow set the prisoners from the Alabama ashore, probably on their parole. Mr. Mason and Rev. Mr. Tremlett left London on Monday morning for Southampton. Captain Semmes was received by the people of the town with great enthusiasm, and was cheered lustily on appearing in the streets.

The yacht Deerhound is of 190 tons and 70 horse-power, and was built by Messrs. Laird of Birkenhead. Mr. Lancaster arrived at Cherbourg only on Saturday night, but at once put to sea with his wife and family, determined to witness the fight.

The Kearsage is described in the United States Navy List as 1,031 tons register, and as carrying eight guns, but her armament has been increased. The Alabama was of 1,040 tons register, and carried one 7-inch Blakeley rifled gun, one 8-inch smooth bore pivot gun, and six 32-pounders, smooth bore, in broadside. The result of the contest is to be attributed first to the deadly fire of the columbiads on board the Kearsage, second to the protection afforded to the Kearsage by the iron cables on her sides, and third to her superior condition compared with the bad state of repair of the Alabama.

ON the 3rd inst. General Grant assaulted the Confederate lines, and, after a combat lasting an hour and a half, had to retire with a loss of nearly 6,000 killed and wounded, besides several hundred prisoners. In the evening of the same day the Confederates assaulted the Federal left, and after half an hour's engagement returned to their entrenchments. On the next night the Confederates again attacked the enemy. The Federals admit that their losses during the week ending June 4 were 10,000 killed and wounded. On the 6th the Confederates made a reconnaissance of Burnside's position. From then to the 11th no important movements were announced. It was reported that Grant was about to commence siege operations, and, later, that he had moved his left from the Confederate front, and that a portion of his troops had crossed to the south bank of the Chickahominy at Despatch Station. In short, Grant has been forced to adopt M'Clellan's plan of campaign, but under circumstances much less favourable.

On June 5, Mr. Stanton, in an official despatch to General Dix, says: 'Our entire loss in killed, wounded, and missing, during the three days' operations around Cold Harbour, will not exceed, according to the Adjutant-General's report, 7,500.'

Confederate official despatches contradict a rumour that the Federals, under General Hunter, had gained a victory on the 5th near Staunton, Virginia, and captured six guns and a quantity of stores.

It is reported that on the 6th General Johnston's headquarters were at Marietta, and that his left, centre, and right were respectively commanded by Generals Polk, Hood, and Hardee.

There are many reports about the movements of General Morgan in Kentucky. One is to the effect that he captured Mount Stirling and Paris, and occupied Georgetown, Falmouth, and Williamstown. The last is that a portion of his forces were defeated near Mount Stirling, and that he had entered Lexington, burnt the railway depôt, and moved towards Frankfort. General Morgan is not likely to divide his small command, and if there is a vestige of truth in the reported defeat at Mount Stirling, it probably only relates to a company surprised by the enemy.

The Confederates have blocked the Mississippi at Greensville, and captured or destroyed four gunboats and seven transports. The Federal war steamer, Waterwitch, was captured on the 3rd inst. at Ossabaw Sound, Georgia, by a boat expedition from Fort M'Alister.

We elsewhere give an account of the Presidential campaign in the United States. General Fremont has resigned his command in the army, and accepted the Cleveland nomination. In his letter to the Convention he objects to the confiscation resolution. Mr. Lincoln has been nominated by his Baltimore Convention, and of course has accepted the nomination.

A meeting was held on June 4, in Union Square, New York, to manifest 'the nation's gratitude to General Grant.' About 5,000 persons were present. The resolutions assumed the speedy end of the war, and also the necessity of reinforcing the armies. Mr. Lincoln wrote a letter, in which he says, 'I trust that at your meeting you will so shape your good words that they may turn into men and guns moving to his and their support,' from which it appears that he shares the general uneasiness about the situation in Virginia. Mr. Chase, having regard to the approaching Presidential election, came out strongly on the Abolition platform. He wrote: 'It will be the marvel of future historians that statesmen of this day were willing to risk the success of rebellion rather than intrust to black loyalists bullets and ballots.' This is not quite fair to Mr. Lincoln, who has never evinced any indisposition to drive 'black bullocks' into his slaughterpens, and who does not care whether votes are constitutionally given or not, if they are loyal to him. Copies of a poem in honour of Grant were distributed amongst the crowd. The following stanzas must convince the most exacting critic that the poem was worthy of the occasion:—

ARMA, VIRUMQUE CANO.

Columbia's Eagle! yield a plume;
Your muse would now indite
Some grateful words to Grant, for whom
The people meet to-night:
Our valiant Chief, who breasts the storm
And braves the rebel wrath,
Says, 'Throughout all the season warm
I'll battle on the path!'

. . . . . .

Hail! Columbia's realm—
Where milk and honey flow,
Delighting hearts of them
Who such blest comforts know;
And knowing, warmly love
Thee with their heart and soul—
Prizing our land above
All lands, from pole to pole.

. . . . . .

This Spangled Banner raise,
And let the music sound:
The name of Grant we'll praise
On Freedom's happy ground!
Land of our Washington
(Boasting heroes gallant),
Hence in thy History's spun
The splendid fame of Grant!

After the speeches, and passing a resolution appointing a committee to convene 'assemblages of the people' from time to time for the support of the Government, there was much cheering for Grant and M'Clellan, and the crowd was entertained with a 'magnificent pyrotechnic display.'

On the night of May 10, Mr. George Washington Sargent was murdered in his own house near Natchez, Mississippi, by three soldiers of the Federal army. It appears that late at night, he on hearing a noise had gone to the door of his house, when he was confronted by the three men, all of whom were in uniform, and one of whom demanded his money and at the same time discharged a pistol at him. The fellows were, however, prevented from plundering the house by the arrival on the scene of some of the servants, who had been alarmed by the sound of the shot. It was found, on a search being made, that the alarm bell had been muffled and the wire cut. Mr. Sargent lingered in great agony till the morning of May 14, when he expired. The assassins have not been discovered, though the hour was late and the Federal garrison small. That they could have been detected without difficulty can scarcely be doubted, and it is clear that the authorities were bound to protect, as far as possible, persons residing peaceably in a place occupied by their troops.

Mr. Sargent resided in early life in Mississippi. His father Winthrop Sargent, a distinguished officer of the war of the Revolution, was first Governor of Mississippi while it was yet a territory, having been appointed to that post by Washington. Mr. Sargent also resided for some years in Philadelphia, but for the fifteen years preceding his death he had lived near Natchez. He was possessed of a large fortune and lived in retirement, never mixing in political affairs. He was of the age of sixty-three at the time of his barbarous murder.

In our Parliamentary Notes, and in some extracts from Canadian papers, we give an account of the arrest of a British subject by the Federals. Mr. Levey was released on June 4, and telegraphed to his friends—'There was no charge against me.' The Montreal Gazette of June 11 remarks:—

Mr. Levey was imprisoned from Thursday, May 26, to Saturday, June 4, which is ten days, there being no charge against him, nor even the shadow of one. He is a British subject, and a British merchant, happening to touch the port of Boston in a British passenger steamship. We are assured on the authority of his friends who know him well that his opinions are not in favour of secession; but he is on the contrary a Northern sympathiser—i. e. if reflection in the leisure of a Federal cell has not altered his views. The conclusion of the whole is that he is a victim of a rank and noxious spy system which has grown up on the grave of liberty, and which must have branches or ramifications on British soil.

On June 11, in New York, gold was quoted at 97⅝ per cent. prem., being a rise in the week of 5⅝ per cent. On the 7th a bill was introduced into the House of Representatives authorising a new loan of $400,000,000 for the support of the Government during the next fiscal year.

ENGLAND.

The Channel Fleet is busily engaged at Spithead, filling up with coal, provisions, and stores in readiness to proceed, if required, to the Baltic. Every ship is in the most splendid order.

The iron-cased corvette Wolverine, and the Resistance and Enterprise rams, left Yarmouth Roads last week for the North. They will proceed as far as Leith.

The authorities at the War Office seem keenly alive to the importance of retaining in the ranks the ten-year men who were enlisted into the army of the Crimean war. A royal warrant ordains that all soldiers who may re-engage themselves on the completion of the first term of their limited engagement shall receive the value of a new kit, a bounty of 2*l.*, re-engagement money, 1*l.*, and gratuity 1*l.* with two months' furlough. Men who take their discharge and re-engage within twelve months will count all their former service, and will be allowed good-conduct pay in all cases where they were in receipt thereof before discharge. The troops serving in India, China, and New Zealand are to be allowed 5*l.* in lieu of furlough. Soldiers serving in the Mediterranean will be allowed 3*l.* gratuity; and if they desire a furlough, their passage to and from England will be defrayed by Government, and two clear months allowed them in this country.

Matters do not seem to run very smoothly in the cotton districts. The guardians and the men in receipt of relief are in open hostility. The former are determined that if the men work only five hours a day the pay shall be in proportion, while the men express an equally strong resolution not to work longer than five hours. Up to Tuesday all was quiet at Ashton, Stalybridge, and Dukinfield, and every preparation had been made to prevent a breach of the peace.

At the meeting of the Relief Committee on Monday it was proposed to ask the President of the Poor Law Board for further powers under the Public Works Act to obtain a loan of an additional half-million of money. Mr. Farnall said that there was yet 100,000*l.* unspent of the money applicable to the purpose. It was replied that the money was all apportioned, and, in the face of a probable increase of the distress in the winter, the resolution was adopted unanimously.

The Houses of Convocation met on Tuesday. In the Upper House the Bishop of Oxford brought up the report of the Committee on 'Essays and Reviews.' It pronounced that the book contained false and dangerous statements and reasonings at variance with the teaching of the Church of England, and deserving the condemnation of the Synod; that the third Essay denied the supernatural origin of Christianity, struck at the root of all revealed religion, and stated theories irreconcilable with the existence of the Church of Christ. 'Literal prognostication' or the direct prediction of future events was greatly disparaged, if not absolutely denied. In the book it was distinctly affirmed that the Evangelists and Apostles never intimated that a supernatural gift of inspiration was bestowed upon them, nor claimed for themselves an immunity from error in their writings. Even the highest doctrines of the faith were not exempt from erroneous treatment. Thus, in speaking of the Holy Trinity, Dr. Williams applied the term 'person' only to God the Father, to the exclusion of the Son and the Holy Ghost. The fourth Essay advanced the proposition that men might, as the condition of being invested with the office of teachers in the Church, subscribe to articles of religion without believing them to be true. On these grounds the book merited the condemnation of the Synod. The Bishop of Oxford moved that the report be adopted. In the event of that proposal being agreed to, he should move a resolution condemning the book. It would then be necessary to transmit the resolution to the Lower House, in order that Convocation might proceed to a synodical judgment. The object was to clear the Church from complicity with such false views. The Bishop of London spoke against the adoption of the report, which was, however, carried on a division—the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Bangor voting in the minority.

A case (Weiss v. Lord A. Loftus) which afforded no small amusement to the hearers was tried last week before the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury at Westminster. The plaintiff by his own statement was a privileged citizen of Berlin and a Doctor of Laws. He sought to recover from the defendant Lord A. Loftus, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, the sum of five hundred Prussian dollars, as advanced rent for ten years in respect of the premises occupied by the British Embassy at Berlin. The plaintiff's case was, that he hired the premises of Baron Arnim at 6,050 dollars, and let them to Lord A. Loftus at 6,500 dollars, and therefore was entitled to be paid the difference. The case of the defendant was, that he employed the plaintiff simply as a house-agent, and had paid him for his service. The ridiculous part of the affair was that the plaintiff insisted on conducting his own case and making a long and unintelligible oration in execrable English. Next he examined Earl Russell, who had been summoned as a witness, and who produced a pile of papers from the Foreign Office, and then he put himself in the witness box. Afterwards the Counsel for the defendant read out the answers of Baron Arnim, who had been examined abroad, upon which the plaintiff quietly remarked that the statements were all lies, and was at once told by the Judge that if he repeated that observation he would be sent to prison. So also, when Mr. Bovill addressed the jury, the plaintiff interrupted him repeatedly, and was once more threatened with fine and imprisonment. Indeed, it was not until the threat had been many times expressed that the plaintiff subsided into a rational state. Eventually the jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Our contemporary, the Illustrated London News, published last Saturday an admirable portrait of Major-General J. E. B. Stuart. In the preceding week the same journal contained a portrait of Major-General Longstreet, and in the week before that a portrait of General Robert E. Lee, commander-in-chief of the army of the Confederate States.

SCOTLAND.

Mr. James Miller, Professor of Surgery in the University of Edinburgh, died on Friday last at the age of 52. Mr. Miller was Professor of Pictorial Anatomy to the Royal Academy, and Surgeon-in-Ordinary to the Queen for Scotland. He was the author of 'The Principles and Practice of Surgery,' which has passed in this country through four editions and has circulated largely in America. He wrote the article on 'Surgery' in the Encyclopædia Britannica, the 'Surgical Experiences of Chloroform,' and other works. He was a great advocate of the 'temperance' doctrines, and took an active part in philanthropic and religious agitations. He was an elder in the Free Church, and was an extreme supporter of its theories and practice.

IRELAND.

William Smith O'Brien died on Saturday last at Bangor, North Wales. He was born on October 17, 1803, and was educated at Harrow School, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He entered Parliament as Member for Ennis in 1826, and he represented the county of Limerick from 1835 until 1849. At first O'Brien opposed Daniel O'Connell both in the county of Clare and in the House of Commons; but a change came over him, and in 1844 he became the ardent supporter of O'Connell, by whom he stood at the trial of the latter, and to act in subordination to or concert with whom seemed to be his great desire. O'Connell, however, shrank from the violent measures to which the Young Ireland party and their leader were anxious to resort. Moreover, he differed both in political and religious ideas from O'Brien, and, lastly, he entertained a deep jealousy of the rising popularity of the latter. Indeed, it was impossible for O'Connell, a good Catholic, a detester of Republican institutions, a sceptic in the matter of repeal, to act cordially, or even to sympathise, with a Protestant—a Republican replete with the excesses, the speculations, and even the terminology of the French Democracy, the bitter and implacable enemy of the Union. O'Connell, moreover, had risen on the shoulders of the priesthood: in all the churches of Ireland the zeal of him who laboured in the Catholic cause had been recognised. He could talk, perhaps, of the men who would rise at the stamp of his foot and strike a blow for Ireland, even as Pompeius did when Cæsar was at the Rubicon; but he was too prudent a man not to form an accurate measure of the weakness of Ireland and the enormous power of England. So there was a secession, and Young Ireland established itself in 1846 on a separate platform with O'Brien, Dillon, Doheny, O'Gorman, Mitchell, and others for the leaders. Shortly afterwards Mitchell again seceded, and in the columns of the United Irishmen taught the arts of barricades and street-fighting, and roused the Lord-Lieutenant to fortify the position of the Imperial Government in Dublin by the most active measures. Then, too, O'Brien, Gavan Duffy, and Meagher, having everywhere established societies for the due preparation of the people for revolution, republic, and the dynasty of O'Brien, finally set out for Paris, and solicited Lamartine to aid them. The French statesman was magnificent in his words, talked of 'destiny,' 'glorious isle,' and 'generous France,' but also mentioned 'diplomacy and treaties.' In April, the meeting at the city of Limerick took place, and O'Brien found how deeply the Old Ireland party had been wounded in the fall of its chief, while Mitchell beheld himself burnt in effigy, hardly escaping with his life. O'Brien, too, was struck by the furious mob. At last the ıtience of Lord Clarendon was exhausted. He arrested itchell on May 13, had him tried, convicted, sentenced ten years' transportation, and conveyed to Bermuda. 'Brien and Meagher were liberated, the jury not ing able to agree. At the end of July, O'Brien left ublin, and harangued the people in Carlow and Kilenny, calling upon them to rise in arms. A reward of 00*l.* was put upon him. On July 29 he appeared with a nall force at Boulagh Common, Ballingarry, where rant, the sub-inspector of police, had fortified himlf in command of fifty men in the house of a widow ımed Cormac. A short fight ensued; but a second rty of police came up and charged the rebels, ho instantly broke and fled. O'Brien for a few ys concealed himself among the peasantry, and at ngth proceeded to the railway station at Thurles, inding to go to Limerick. He was recognised and rested. On September 21, he, with Meagher and 'Manus, was tried at Clonmel. All three were conicted of high treason, and sentenced to be hanged, drawn, nd quartered. The sentence was commuted to transrtation for life. However, at the end of eight years, 'Brien was pardoned, and permitted to return home.

His lineage is traced by Burke to Brien Boroihme, who egan to reign in 1002, and was killed at the battle of lontarf in 1014. In the reign of Henry VIII. Murrough 'Brien surrendered his royalty, and was created Earl of homond and Baron Inchiquin. The fifth earl was reated Marquis of Thomond in 1800, and a peer of the nited Kingdom as Baron Thomond. Sir Edward 'Brien of Dromoland was succeeded by his son Sir ucius in 1765, who was succeeded by his son Sir dward in 1795. Sir Edward married the daughter of r. William Smith, of Cahirmoyle, in the county of imerick. His eldest son, Sir Lucius, the fifth baronet, oved his right to the barony of Inchiquin before the ommittee of Privileges in April 1862. William Smith 'Brien was the younger brother of this Sir Lucius.

William Smith O'Brien was a man remarkable for umanity and honesty; his faults were not those of the eart. Politically speaking, he may be said to have been estitute of intelligence; for having an end in view, he either was able nor did he care to calculate the means. is dreams of wild ambition and mistaken patriotism rged him to acts little short of madness, but of all the gitators or leaders in civil commotion who have lived, he as the least obnoxious to suspicion or hatred.

INDIA.

It is rumoured in Calcutta that several new native regients are about to be raised. The men will be drawn om the Poorbheas or natives of Hindostan Proper, the d Pandy element, exclusively.

Lieutenant-Colonel Patrick Stewart, Director-General f the Government electric telegraph to India, accomanied by Sir Charles Bright the engineer of the expedion, and by the members of their staff, has returned to Bombay from Bushire viâ Kurrachee. The land line of he telegraph is completed from Bushire to Kayeroon, but me months must elapse before the whole line can be pened, difficulties almost insuperable being found to rise from the dilatoriness and apathy of the Turks.

In accordance with a rule laid down by Sir Charles Wood, the independent Rajahs of India are to retain nly a limited number of troops, and to be supplied with n amount of ammunition to be annually fixed by the British Government.

His Excellency the Viceroy was to return to Calcutta om Simlah in October, and would afterwards hold urbars at Meerut, Agra, Futtehgurh, and Cawnpore.

There was still an immense expansion observable in comercial operations at Bombay. In one week there were rought out the Bombay Joint-Stock Corporation, the Bombay Presidency Bank, the Indian Peninsular Bank, nd the Khandeish Farming Company, all on the limited ability principle.

CHINA.

A letter from the Hon. Frederick W. A. Bruce, Her Majesty's Minister in China, to Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, with reference to the resumption of active operaions by that officer in concert with the Governor of Kiangsoo, has been published in England. Mr. Bruce ays that he acquiesced in the course taken by Gordon, because of the assurance received from the Chinese auhorities, that in future operations the rules of warfare as practised by foreign nations should be observed. He also thinks it due to Colonel Gordon to state that his conurrence in the step taken by Gordon was founded in a great measure on the knowledge of the high motives that ad guided the latter while in command of the Chinese force, of his disinterested conduct in money matters, and of the influence exercised by him in favour of humanity. Mr. Bruce further points out that it would be a serious calamity if Colonel Gordon was compelled to leave his work incomplete, and if a dispersion of the force were to bring about a recurrence of the danger from which Shanghai had suffered for two years.

The following news has been received of the French auxiliary force in China. M. d'Aiguebelle has been raised o the rank of Ti-tai (General of Division) for the capture of Hangchow. His Lieutenant, M. Schedelin, has commenced the siege of Hu-tchu-fu, the last town of Tchekiang remaining in the possession of the rebels. The transport L'Orne has arrived at Shanghai to embark one half of the French Zéphyres; the remainder are to follow shortly; it is believed that they will be next employed in Africa. Every one regrets the departure of the few troops which remained to remind the Chinese of the force which at once conquered them and restored order to the country. The murderer of the English officer, Mr. Dove, has been taken and hanged on the very spot where he committed the crime.

TUNIS.

The insurgent Bey of Tunis, Ali-ben-Rdam, has named a successor to his throne, officially known as 'Bey of the Camp,' and has sent this personage, with a body of 5,000 cavalry, to a position near Trestour, about 24 hours' march from Tunis. The Ministry have received information that the insurgents were about to attack the Bardo, the Bey's summer palace, distant some five miles from the city. It was for some time a question whether the palace should be defended or the Bey retire to the protection of the guns of the citadel. The former course was preferred, and the palace is now regularly armed and fortified, and garrisoned with the best troops available. It is hoped that the people will return to their allegiance, as the Bey is by no means disliked by them, although his late taxation has been oppressive. It is most unlikely that foreign Powers will interfere with his independence. France has enough to do with one military colony, and any further annexations on her part would create an inextinguishable jealousy in the minds of the Italian Government; not less improbable is it that Italy should attempt to create a colony on the African coast, considering the state of her finances, and the touchiness of her nearest neighbour. As for a restoration of the power of the Porte over his nominal province of Tunis, it cannot be seriously contemplated for a moment.

ALGIERS.

A smart action was fought by General Martineau, near Geryville, on April 26, the details of which have only lately appeared; the forces of the Arabs were 5,000 in number, 3,000 of whom were cavalry. The action consisted almost entirely of a succession of murderous charges executed by the Chasseurs d'Afrique, which were completely successful, though not without entailing severe loss on the victors; 68 officers and men were killed on the spot, and 33 wounded were left at the hospital at Geryville.

On June 5 the Marabout Si-el-Azereg made a smart attack upon the camp of General Rose at Dar-ben-Abdallah, but was repulsed with enormous loss and himself slain. Thus the insurrection has lost one of its most energetic and influential chiefs. The Moniteur tells us that the Kabyle and Taliarian labourers are coming down from the mountains for their annual employment as reapers in the plains above Constantine and Algiers. This may be considered as a guarantee of the tranquillity of the provinces whence they come, and an indication of the allegiance of the lower orders to the established Government. All leads to the hope that the insurrection is touching its conclusion.

JAPAN.

The mission of the Japanese Ambassadors in Paris has terminated. Satisfaction and apologies for the murder of Lieutenant Camus have been offered and accepted by the French Government. The treaty has been signed on both sides; the ambassadors are now on their way to their native country. By advices from Japan we learn that the Daimios have met in council, and that after great discussion the principle of concession to foreign Powers favoured by the Mikado was carried by a majority.

THE CONTINENT.

THE Conference of London met again after two postponements on Saturday last, the 18th inst. It is understood that the four hours during which the plenipotentiaries sat were mainly occupied by recriminations between Danes and Germans, in the course of which a threat of most significant character was used by one of the latter, to which we shall revert presently. The accusations levelled by Denmark against the exactions of the Germans during the time of truce drew from Herr von Bismarck a lengthy contradiction; it is contained in a despatch addressed by him to Count Bernstorff, dated June 10th. The chief point of it is that the so-called exactions were only a legitimate demand for the delivery of contributions due long before. One case is cited, in which the order was given on April 28, the return to which ought to have made within forty-eight hours. The Prussian Minister takes credit to himself that the Danish citizens were not called upon to pay until after May 12, and considers that the truce then existing could not possibly affect the rights of the Allied Powers to the payment of demands made previous to it. We need only observe on this that were Herr von Bismarck's view of the law to be accepted, every armistice might be made a dead letter; the belligerent need only make a requisition previous to the ratification of the armistice for contributions sufficient to cover his expenses during the course of it; he need only give orders for the execution of certain military movements sufficient to occupy his forces during the month or six weeks of the suspension of arms; and, as the truce is not to affect any action ordered before the commencement of it, he will be at liberty to exact his contributions and dispose his forces exactly as he chooses. 'But is this law? Ay, marry, is't; Prussian bully's law.' Herr Von Bismarck next observes upon the complaints made by the Danes against military action taken by the Prussian authorities: his answer simply is that the Danes have done the same; if the Prussians have destroyed the works at Düppel, the Danes have fortified Alsen and Fünen: he further complains of the presence of Danish ships in the debateable waters, and of the attempts at recruiting made within the territory now occupied by the Allies. Our readers will understand from this despatch of what nature were the recriminations of Saturday last. The threat used by the German plenipotentiaries was simply this, that should the blockade be resumed by Denmark, they should set the treaty of 1856 at defiance and employ privateers. This threat is of great significance, because it shows at last most indisputably the real spirit which actuates the German Powers in their repudiation of treaties. If there is any one in whom the idea still lingers that the treaty of 1852 has been repudiated by the Germans from a sincere though mistaken sense of patriotism, or from an excusable though extravagant weakness for 'Vaterland,' this threat ought entirely to dispel his illusions. The brutal insolence which has so recklessly plunged Europe into anxiety and spread mourning and indignation through the little kingdom of Denmark, has imbibed fresh strength from the impunity too long allowed it, and now impudently proclaims that it will violate the law of Europe—a law not traceable to obsolete feudal prerogatives, or rusty and unmanageable from long disuse, but one fresh from the council table of the united nations, the offspring of the wisdom, self-denial, and moderation of the countries which alone could ultimately profit by its abolition. 'Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat:' and nothing but sheer lunacy could have inspired the plenipotentiari · to use such a threat at a time when the indignation of England is ripening into an irrepressible demand for war. It remains to be seen what notice France and Russia will take, in company with ourselves, of a declaration alike so impudent and so insane.

With regard to the various projects for pacification which we enumerated last week, we have not much to chronicle. The proposal which receives the greatest attention is that made by England for drawing a line through the Duchy of Slesvig, along the banks of the Schlei, and the course of the Dannewirke; this has been accepted by Denmark though with reluctance in the ultimatum issued by Bishop Mourad; it is acceded to by France, Russia, and Sweden; the latter, indeed, if we are to believe an apocryphal statement in the Moniteur du Soir, intends to retire from the Conference, should the proposed line of division be abandoned. The German powers followed by the German Confederation have proposed another line known as the 'Apenrade-Tondern,' about twenty-five miles north of the Dannewirke; the efforts made to induce them to accept the compromise of England have as yet been unsuccessful; moreover, they demand most positively that, after the line is drawn, the population on either side of it should be allowed to decide on their own government by vote. We in England who believe little in the security of decisions so arrived at, however fairly the voting may be conducted, would prefer to see the affair settled either by conference or by arbitration. In the meantime the close of the prolonged suspension of hostilities approaches. The Danes display no inclination to renew it, unless some neutral power will agree to maintain the line of division proposed by England. By Sunday next we shall know whether we have asserted our place as a first-class nation, or have undergone a humiliation which will eventually cost us long years of war. The German powers continue to treat with contempt all ideas of war with England; they affect to rejoice over the new alliance which must spring up between France and Germany, and express their inability to see that we can do them any injury.

By the latest despatches we learn that Prussia has rejected the English proposals relative to the line of division in Slesvig. She also rejects the arbitration of any Power represented at the Conference. No prolongation of the suspension of hostilities will be accepted by her for a less period than two months. On the other hand, the semi-official Vienna journals are in favour of the arbitration of the Emperor Napoleon on the Dano-Germanic question.

THE united front which the Austro-Prussian alliance displays to the outer world by no means corresponds to a state of unity within. The Czar of Russia, by ceding his right to a part of Holstein to the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg, has thrown an apple of discord between the two brothers in arms. As we stated in our last number, the Duke of Augustenburg showed no inclination to accede to the wishes of Herr von Bismarck by giving up Kiel and Rendsburg to Federal occupation, should he be so fortunate as to have them to give. The Prussian is supposed thereupon to have transferred his affections to the nominee of Russia, whom he hopes to find made of more malleable stuff; moreover, there are dark hints at the possibility of a cession of the Oldenburg territory to Prussia, should the Grand-Duke become possessed of Slesvig-Holstein. The suspicion of a possibility by which Prussia might add to her present power has been enough to kindle a flame of indignation in Vienna; it is possible that the quarrel between the two countries, if adroitly handled, might contribute to the pacification of Europe; 'when thieves fall out, honest men get their own.'

THE DUCHIES.

Meetings have been held at Rendsburg, and deputations sent to the King of Prussia from patriotic committees in Slesvig, to protest against any division of that duchy; but it is impossible to say what value can be put upon these demonstrations: German propagandism has already effected more in the southern part of the Peninsula than had the natural influences of the last fifty years. The subscriptions towards the Slesvig-Holstein loan raised by the Duke of Augustenburg amount to 135,685*l.*, or 20,353*l.*; this gives an average of rather less than 10*d.* per head subscribed by the inhabitants of the Duchies. The civil authorities of Flensburg (Slesvig) have published an order to the effect that for the future German should be the language used for instruction in the schools of Hadersleben; the Danish language shall only be taught for six hours in the week. It will be observed that Hadersleben is some way north of the line of division proposed by the Prussians themselves for Slesvig.

DENMARK.

The Rigsraad, or House of Representatives for Denmark and Slesvig, has been convoked for the 25th instant. Baron von Scheel-Plessen, the Danish Ambassador at St. Petersburg, has arrived at Copenhagen with the proposal already referred to in our last number, by which Russia hopes to maintain the integrity of Denmark. What the proposal is has not yet transpired.—The Danish authorities have found it necessary to use strong precautionary measures against the German sympathisers in the island of Sylt, on the west coast of Slesvig. Troops have been landed there, and a state of siege proclaimed. Seven ardent spirits were arrested and sent to Copenhagen, out of the way of the furnace of German patriotism, to cool.—The Dagbladet, in commenting on the absence of the promised support from England or Sweden, calls upon the Government, should this continue, to seek for aid from the revolutionary elements in Europe, and no longer from the regularly constituted governments. It proposes that a foreign legion should be enlisted, and the offers of Garibaldi (?) accepted.

GERMANY.

While Herr von Bismarck occupies himself on the one hand with the administration of severe reproofs to Denmark for erécting defensive fortifications on the island of Fünen, he is not slow on the other hand to take all measures that seem good to him for the strengthening of the offensive power of Prussia. Three corvettes have been sent to Dantzic to reprovision; the regiments now in Slesvig have been reinforced up to their full complement; and Prince Frederic Charles, the Commander-in-Chief, has returned to the scene of war.

The attention of Germany has been more particularly called to the movements of the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia. The first of these has, as we related last week, passed through Berlin on his way to Kissingen; the Emperor and Empress of Austria left Vienna on the 14th inst., spent a few hours at Munich, and then passed on to the rendezvous at Kissingen. Their Majesties are accompanied by Herr von Rechberg, just as the Emperor of Russia is also accompanied by Prince Gortschakoff. On the 18th inst. the King of Prussia took his departure for the watering-place of Carlsbad in Bohemia; his Prussian Majesty also takes with him the President of his Council, Herr von Bismark, with a complete diplomatic staff. We notice the fact that each of these monarchs is accompanied by the Minister fulfilling the functions in each case of Foreign Secretary, only because certain journals have been most earnest in inculcating upon us that these visits are of no political significance whatever. Nothing can be plainer than that kings and emperors, like other mortals, require to wash and be clean; and that, like other men again, they must go to their baths, since the baths will not come even to them. The Foreign Secretaries are, of course, the best men to undertake the office of Lord High Courier to their Majesties, from their intimate acquaintance with the language and feelings of foreign countries: and thus it is that every monarch takes that important officer with him in his train. We only hope that these distinguished functionaries receive a handsome gratuity for the performance of a service which they might fairly plead they were not engaged for. The same journals declare positively that no treaty has been made between the three great Powers of Eastern Europe for the mutual guarantee of their Polish possessions.

A Berlin journal terminates an article on the politics of the House of Representatives in the following words, which we quote for the clue which they give to the causes which engaged Prussia in the present war:—'Let us hope that the feelings to which late events have given rise will assist in doing away with the unhappy differences of former years. Let us hope that this same Chamber of Deputies, which not long ago answered the appeal of the Government by a categorical refusal, will now aid the authorities to fulfil their important mission for the welfare of Slesvig-Holstein, of Prussia, and of Germany. But even were the position to become more critical, the Government would certainly not await the exhaustion of the whole of its reserve funds to apply with confidence to the national representatives for an active and patriotic assistance.'

A Conference is about to be held at Munich on the question of the amalgamation of the Customs' duties throughout Northern Germany. We have already made a few remarks on this subject, pointing out that the former Zollverein was in a moribund state, and that some difficulty was found in reconstituting it on a more solid basis. This Conference will be attended by the ministers of all the German States, except perhaps Electoral Hesse. The part that Austria will take in this Conference will simply be to maintain as far as possible the position in which it was placed by the Commercial Treaty of 1853. The partisans of the Franco-Prussian Treaty of Commerce have issued invitations for a general assembly, to be held at Stuttgardt on the 19th instant; the object of this meeting would also be the maintenance of the Zollverein, but the point of view from which its promoters look at the question differs from that taken at Munich.

A short, but to us English most interesting, experiment was lately made, by order of the King of Prussia, of the capabilities both of his guns and of his armour-plates. When we say his, we mean it in the grammatical sense of 'belonging to him;' for both guns and plates were of the best French manufacture. Fifteen shots only were fired, thirteen of which struck with effect, and two rebounded from the target. The guns used were 12-5 and 5-5-pounders; the distance for the former 1,000, for the latter 500 yards. The amount of powder is not stated; but probably a very full charge was used, as the object was to test the guns. None of the indentations in the plates were of a greater depth than 2½ inches. If we compare these results with those lately obtained in England in experiments of the same nature, we must come to the conclusion that the French 12-5-pounder has not yet approached its English rival in execution. That the resistance of the plates is not due to any superiority on their part over the English manufacture will readily be allowed when we observe that they were supplied by M. Petin Gaudet & Co., a firm which has obtained a respectable but not a distinguished reputation in England.

FRANCE.

The elections for the partial renewal of the conseils généraux and the conseils d'arrondissement are now taking place in Paris. The former bodies are renewed by the retirement of one-third of their number every three years; the latter by the retirement of one-half their number at the same time. The questions which come before them are not necessarily of a political character, but are often of sufficient importance to interest the Government considerably. It is, in our opinion, most unfortunate that domiciliary visits should have been made with respect to these elections similar to those which occurred in the elections for the Legislative Body, and a challenge thus issued by the Government to the Opposition to engage in a new contest of strength. The effect of these challenges has as yet been constantly the same—the people has taken the part of the weaker, and has thus given to the Opposition a support far greater than that party either deserves or has a right to expect. These visits were made by the police to the houses of certain gentlemen the majority of whom are members of the Paris bar; among them MM. Garnier-Pagès and Carnot, members of the Corps Législatif. The charge against them is that they belong to an illicit electoral association, the law against which is found in the 291st article of the Code Pénal. The greater part of the men who received these visits are members of a 'Consulting Committee of Advocates,' formed to give advice to all electors, no matter what might be their political creed, on any difficulties arising under the electoral law. This committee, however, received neither warning nor visit at the general elections of last year, when M. Garnier-Pagès' private committee was broken up by the police.

One of those great natural commotions has occurred in the Department of Doubs, on the western slopes of Jura, which tend to convince us of the possibility of some of the marvellous tales of geology. In consequence of the heavy rains which have lately fallen there, a great body of land slipped from the base of marl on which it rested, and overwhelmed the plain below it. The most frightful disorder was the natural consequence. Small landholders found a garden standing where ought to have been their little field of corn; another has found his meadow exchanged for a thick plantation. The whole place is full of enormous cracks and gullies; trees are lying about, crushed and distorted by the enormous weight; while the proprietors are wandering about scarcely alive to the fact that the small plot of land which they once called their own is lying covered by the properties of one or two others. Geologists and curiosity-seekers have assembled from all parts to examine into this remarkable effort of nature.

A story is related, which is perhaps unequalled for illustrating the manner in which a succession of murders and suicides may follow upon the most trivial act possible. A child was about to receive its first communion; but happening to see a plate of strawberries she inadvertently ate two of them, thus breaking the law of the Roman Church, which requires that all persons should receive the communion fasting. She confessed the fact to her pastor, who dismissed her with a few kind words till the morrow. The excitement of the child, however, was so great that she rose in the night, and fled to a house at some distance where she was taken in. Her mother rose early; finding that the child was gone, she was seized with an awful fear that she had drowned herself; she rushed to the river-side, and, thinking that she saw the corpse floating in the water, plunged in and was drowned. As if this were not enough, a brother-in-law of the unfortunate woman, being out of his mind, refused to believe in her death, and declared she was hidden in a neighbour's house. His wife attempted to calm him; whereupon he seized a double-barrelled gun, with one charge of which he killed his servant dead on the spot, and with the other blew out his own brains. Three deaths for eating two strawberries!

Who is anxious to cover the greatest possible amount of ground in the shortest time?—to visit Constantinople, passing through Vienna and the Principalities, to steam down the Danube and return in a fortnight? Such is the programme offered by the Eastern Railway of France. The traveller may go from Paris through Stuttgardt, Munich, Salzburg, and Vienna, descend the Danube from Bazias to the Black Sea, and thence by sea to Constantinople, all in the space of five days and a half. We recommend the attempt to those who, having scaled every Alp and traversed every desert, are now on the look-out for fresh worlds to conquer. They may be assured that nothing they have yet accomplished will equal this journey as a trial to their nervous and muscular system.

RUSSIA.

An elaborate defence of Russian conduct in Circassia and Georgia has been undertaken by certain foreign journals. It is to the effect that for many years Russia served as the bulwark of Europe against Asiatic barbarism; it has now accepted the mission of civilising Asia. In the last century Peter the Great founded St. Petersburg as a sort of skylight to admit the light and air of European civilisation into his empire. In our times Russia is annexing the Caucasus in order to open a window through which Asia may study the advance made by the western continent. 'All men,' says a correspondent of one of these journals, 'all serious men who look at facts from a humanitarian point of view, have gladly recognised the high and apostolic mission of Russia.' We confess that we admire the ease with which the writer of the above has transformed the semi-barbarous Tartar empire of Russia into a bulwark against Asiatic barbarism. Nor can we refuse a meed of respectful wonder to the theory that Asia will study the civilisation of the west through the window so kindly knocked out for it by Russia in the Caucasus. We never yet heard that the continent of Asia had suffered much from the 'proclivities' of Russia towards annexation; or, to continue the metaphor of the window so kindly supplied to us, that the dwellers in the house need complain of the ardent endeavours of their neighbour to procure for them light and ventilation. But what if the bricks object? What if they are not bricks, but men and women with souls and affections like our own? Have they no cause to cry out when they find themselves carted off to the dust-heap without ceremony? And is it any comfort to them to know that through the hole left by their displacement Asia may contemplate the singularly humane institutions and the admirably developed civilisation of modern Russia? Surely, this line of defence at least had better been left alone.

The news from Poland has for some time been singularly deficient. The most noteworthy fact is that the journal Ojczyzna has published the decree of the National Government of Poland, ordering that all purchases of lands sold by the Russian authorities shall be considered null and void, thus showing that the National Government is still in existence. The same journal announces that the village Pruszanska has been rased to the ground by the Russians, in revenge for a beating received there by one of their spies. All the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were seized and sent off straight to Siberia, many of them half-naked.

TURKEY.

The reception of Prince Couza at Constantinople has been of the most favourable character; the Sultan has expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the deference paid to his wishes by the Prince. All difficulties have been satisfactorily settled save that relating to the seizure of the conventual property, which is to be left to the decision of the Conference. A new order of chivalry is to be shortly instituted by the Prince under the name of the Order of the Star of Roumania.

It is said that the Sultan will visit France and England in the course of the current year.

ITALY.

The state of affairs at Tunis has elicited a statement of the intentions of the Government from the Minister for Foreign Affairs. He has stated in the Chamber of Representatives that it is necessary for the Italian policy that Tunis should remain independent, and that he had taken every possible measure for the protection of the large colony of Italians resident in that territory. General Longoni has received notice to hold his division in readiness to embark for Tunis on the receipt of orders to that effect.

Garibaldi left Caprera on the 7th inst. on board the yacht of the Duke of Sutherland; his purpose is to repair to Ischia for sea-bathing, a change of air having been considered expedient for the restoration of his health.

The 17th inst. was the anniversary of the accession of Pius IX. to the Papal throne. It was celebrated at Rome by a religious ceremony, at which His Holiness assisted; after which he gave an audience and received the homage and compliments of the College of Cardinals and the diplomatic body.

A statement has been published concerning the College of Cardinals, from which we learn that there are now nine cardinal's hats in the gift of the Pope; every vacancy must be constitutionally filled up as soon as created; but the Pope has the right to retain the name of the new cardinal in petto, as it is technically called—that is, in the recesses of his own breast—until such time as he chooses to declare it. Of the sixty-one cardinals now existing, forty-five are above the age of sixty years, so that the amount of patronage in the hands of the Holy Father is likely to be increased.

MEXICO.

THE Emperor of Mexico has by this time taken possession of the throne offered to him by the vote of the people and the magnanimity of the French conqueror. Immediately on his arrival at Vera Cruz, His Majesty issued a proclamation of which the following is a summary. He says that however sorrowful may have been his farewell to his native country, he comes with joy to consecrate all his forces to the welfare of a people who, after having gloriously asserted their independence, are now anxious to enjoy the fruit of civilisation and of true progress. The only true and durable principles on which a modern State can be founded are: inviolable justice; equality of all in the eye of the law; free competition for every social and political distinction; complete personal liberty; the development of national industry; the establishment of means of communication for an extended commerce; and lastly the free play of the intelligence in all its relations to the interests of the public. Such are the principles on which Mexico must be founded; the blessing of Heaven will not be wanting, if the people remain animated by the religious sentiments which have always distinguished the Mexicans. Such also are the principles represented by the civilizing banner of France, to whose Emperor they owe the establishment of order and peace. Every country that has determined to create a future for itself has done so by following this course. As for himself, His Majesty promises to remain faithful to his motto, 'Equity within justice.' His duty is to hold the sceptre with conscientiousness, and the sword of honour with firmness. To the Empress belongs the task of consecrating to the service of the country all the noble sentiments of Christian virtue, and all the kindness of a tender mother. This address, which appears to us more suited to the metaphysical and critical intellects of the Germans than to the Mexican people, has been forwarded to the various prefects, to be posted in the cities of the Empire.

PERU.

The Spanish squadron now in possession of the islands of Chincha has received orders to put no impediment or interruption in the way of commerce. The syndicate established on the islands by the various European companies who enjoy the benefit of international treaties is allowed to continue its administration. It is hoped that the consequence of the very decided action taken by the Spanish Government will be the recognition of the Republic of Peru by that Power. It may not be generally known that this recognition has never yet formally taken place, though so many years have elapsed since the emancipation of the colony.

In New Orleans the Courrier Français, as well as the Picayune, has been suppressed for publishing the forged proclamation.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

A FEDERAL OUTRAGE.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby id he was informed that a gentleman named Levey, a itish subject and a merchant of Montreal, had arrived a rt time since in a British packet—the Asia—at the rt of Boston, and that upon his arrival there he was ought before the United States authorities, who immeately took him into custody. That occurred on the 26th last month, and he was brought before the Commissary-eneral for the purpose of being examined, but without ing told what the charges were which were brought ainst him. His papers were taken from him, and he mained in prison for ten days, at the end of which time e papers were restored without explanation, and he was d that he might leave prison. Up to the present hour appeared he had no idea as to who his accusers were, what the offence was with which he was charged. So , he might add, from Mr. Levey being a suspicious aracter, he was informed that all his sympathies and dilections were in favour of the Federal Government; t whether the treatment which he had received had nde any alteration in those feelings he could not prend to say. The case had, he understood, been laid before r Majesty's representative at Washington, and he should le to know whether any reparation or apology had been ced for by him, or been spontaneously offered by the deral Government; because, although that Government, their prosecution of the unhappy and destructive war which they were engaged, might be willing to sacrifice liberties of their own countrymen and to subject them despotic rule, a friendly nation had a right to insist at its subjects engaged in peaceful and lawful occupaons in the United States should not be exposed to the traordinary and unconstitutional course of proceeding which he had called attention, which was not only the casion of humiliation, but also of the serious loss which detention for a period of ten days must involve in the e of a man engaged in business pursuits. He did not an to say that in the present instance any very serious s had been sustained, but the case was one, nevertheis, which in his opinion deserved the attention of the overnment, because if it were allowed to pass over noticed it was impossible to say to what extent the croachments of the Federal Government might be ried.

Earl Russell said that in the latest despatches from rd Lyons there was no reference to the case of Mr. vey. It was very probable that by the next despatches ne account of it might be received. When such cases the imprisonment of British subjects did occur, as they fortunately did very frequently, Lord Lyons always cled the attention of the American Government to them d required an explanation. In case it appeared that rd Lyons's attention had not been directed to the case, he uld write to him and bring it under his notice.

The Earl of Derby regretted to hear that these cases re of frequent occurrence, for they had certainly not en communicated to Parliament.

Earl Russell said that when he had described these es of imprisonment as being common he did not mean imprisonment without reason; for when explanations ne to be given, it generally appeared that the United tates Government had some reason to induce them to beve that the person imprisoned had been engaged in rding assistance to their enemies. [Which means that r. Seward can always invent an excuse to satisfy Earl ussell.]

THE EMIGRATION BOARD: FEDERAL RECRUITING.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, in the course the discussion on the vote for 10,720*l.* for the Emigran Board, Colonel Dunne asked what sort of supervision us exercised. After a reply from Mr. C. Fortescue, Capn Jervis remarked that Colonel Dunne's question had t been satisfactorily answered. He said that emigrants re being daily carried out to the United States to be ndered at the rate of so many dollars a head, and the estion was what means had the Commissioners taken to form those poor people of the fact, or to guide them in e choice of a fair field for their labour. Mr. C. Fortcue replied that it was not the duty of the Government the Commissioners to persuade emigrants to go to one untry rather than another. Mr. Monsell did not deny at, but there ought to be some British authority in New rk and Boston to see that the emigrants were not unrly dealt with. The number of men who enlisted in land for the United States army was very small comred with those who were laid hold of when they went road. In the present exigency it would be desirable at either the Foreign Office or the Emigration Comssioners should take some steps for the protection of ose poor people. Colonel Dunne said an immense mber of our unfortunate people go over to America thout the slightest intention of enlisting, and get enapped there. He knew an instance of a man who on riving at the other side of the water fell in with people ho gave him drink, and when he awoke he found himlf in the uniform of the United States army and was ld that he had enlisted, and if he refused to serve he ould be shot. He was sent to the scene of war, fought r six months, and, luckily for himself, got ague. They en sent him into hospital, and after a time he made s escape at the risk of being shot, and got home to eland. The same thing happened to several. Why ould not the Government call upon the Consular auorities in the United States to put a stop to doings of at kind? At this moment a great number of our ldiers were about to be discharged after their ten years' rvice, and there were people from the United States atching to pick them up and carry them away. After me observations from other speakers, Captain Jervis said was all very well to talk of the Government not interring with emigrants, but it was generally believed that ey had encouraged the emigration of Irishmen to North merica and allowed the North American authorities to enlist men in Ireland for the purpose of recruiting their armies while the same privilege was not given to the Southern States. The object of spending money on emigration was to open fresh labour markets; but the Government certainly ought to explain how it was that this emigration was made the means of enlistments which were not only contrary to our own laws but those of the United States. Mr. Cardwell denied that this was so. Mr. Hibbert said there were at this moment agents engaged in this country in tempting the Lancashire operatives to emigrate to work in mills in America, and, though he regretted that these people should go, it would be unfair to them if the Government were to interfere. [This is certainly an extreme view of the doctrine of non-intervention.]

IRISH EMIGRATION.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Hennessy called attention to this subject. The number of persons who left Ireland in 1861 was 64,292; in 1862, 70,117; in 1863, 117,820: and the Emigration Commissioners stated in their report, published a few days ago, that if the emigration continued throughout the present year at the rate which it had gone on during the first three months the number this year would be 156,000; and this was taking place in a country in which the number of marriages was declining, the proportion of births to deaths was falling off, and the population was declining more rapidly than that of any country in Europe. The emigration was distributed generally over the country. In 1863 the number of persons who emigrated from Leinster was 15,000; Munster, 55,000; Ulster, 22,500; and Connaught, 18,000. From the year 1851 to December 1863, the total loss by emigration had amounted to 1,431,000 persons, of whom the province of Ulster had contributed no less than 400,000. Last year there were in Ireland 23,715 horses less than there were in 1862; the decline in the number of cattle amounted to 116,615; sheep, 152,201; pigs, 89,522. The total loss of live stock in the year 1863 amounted in value to 1,227,041*l.*; the loss in the previous year having been 1,500,000*l.* The cereal crops diminished in 1862 by 72,000 acres, and in 1863 by 144,000, and in both years the green crops also decreased. In 1863 their decrease amounted to 19,358 acres, and the total loss of cereal and green crops in 1863 was 164,077 acres. He thought the Government should legislate so that farmers might be induced to improve their holdings, instead of putting their money in their pockets and emigrating. He moved: 'That this House observes with regret that the agricultural population of Ireland are rapidly leaving the country; that this House trusts that Her Majesty's Government would direct their attention to the subject with a view of devising some means by which the Irish agricultural population may be induced to devote their capital and labour to reproductive employment at home.'

Sir R. Peel said Ireland had been passing through a trying crisis, but there was now a wonderful revival, and in the month of May there was a sensible diminution of the numbers emigrating. There has also been a diminution, as compared with last year, of 1,000 persons receiving indoor relief from the Unions in Ireland. Sir Robert said: 'No doubt the emigration from Ireland during the last twenty or thirty years has been enormous. I have here the exact figures. Between 1831 and 1841 no less than 400,000 persons left Ireland for the colonies or foreign countries. This was exclusive of a migration of 200,000 into England and Scotland. Between 1841 and 1851 the total number of emigrants from Ireland was 1,240,000. From 1851 to 1860 was a most important period, for not less than 1,190,865 persons left Ireland during that period. That is, no doubt, an enormous emigration within twenty years—an amount perhaps unknown in the annals of any country. I believe a great deal of the emigration that went on during the latter period may be traced to the famine that visited Ireland in 1845, 1846, and 1847, which rendered it absolutely impossible for the population of Ireland to live upon the potato root, and obliged them to seek the means of livelihood elsewhere. There was a progressive emigration during 1861 and two following years. In 1861 66,396 persons left Ireland; in 1862, 72,730; in 1863, 117,820. Mr. Hennessy has quoted some returns to show that a great number of these persons do not go to the United States of America. I think he is not quite accurate in those statements. A small portion, no doubt, go to Canada, but the vast majority go to the United States. I believe there is a return that about 23,000 able-bodied Irishmen entered the Federal service last year. The Registrar-General states that the emigration during the months of January, February, March, April, and May this year amounts to 63,833. The emigration during the corresponding five months of 1863 was 60,246, and during the same months in 1862 only 31,259. So that the increase during the first five months of this year over that of 1862 is nearly double, and is an increase of 3,000 over that of 1863. Since the month of May, however, there has been a sensible decrease of emigration from Ireland. In the month of May itself there was a decrease this year, compared with 1863, of 1,023 emigrants. The information I receive from Cork confirms this statement. There is evidently in the city, which is one of the most important ports of departure, a less desire to emigrate. "The vast tide of emigration," says one account, "has begun to decline in a very perceptible manner." It is too true, I fear, that there are thousands of poor deserted Irish girls who are gaining their lives by vice and other unhappy means in the United States. I have here a statement copied from the Cork Daily Reporter, and taken from the most authentic source, that there are no less than 30,000 Irish females who have left home and friends, and are now walking the streets of New York friendless and deserted.'

After a long discussion the House decided against dividing on Mr. Hennessy's motion, which was therefore lost.

CONSULAR RELATIONS WITH THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, in reply to Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Layard said that no arrangements had as yet been made for the reappointment of the Consuls in the Confederate States, but their salaries were paid, as it would be very ungenerous to stop them under such circumstances.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, in reply to the Earl of Ellenborough, Earl Russell said that the Treaty of 1852 bound the Powers to recognise King Christian IX. as King of Denmark, Duke of Slesvig, Duke of Holstein, and Duke of Lauenburg, but it was not a treaty of guarantee, and the Powers were not bound to enforce its execution. It was unfortunate for the Government that they could not give Parliament an explanation of their policy, and he should rejoice when the protocols of the Conference could be laid upon the table of the House. Without intending to utter a threat of any kind, he might state that 'Her Majesty's fleet is fully prepared for any service which it may be called upon to render.' The Earl of Derby said that, if the negotiations were not soon brought to a conclusion, it would be the duty of Parliament to demand from the Government an exposition of their policy.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, in reply to questions and observations made by Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Osborne, and others, Lord Palmerston said there was an agreement that what passed at the Conference should not be told, and therefore he could give no information about the proceedings. He was sorry to see that reports had got abroad of the proceedings, but that breach of confidence was a very different thing from a statement made by Ministers of the Crown to Parliament. When the negotiations were over, there would be no delay in presenting the proceedings to the House.

THE ASHANTEE WAR.

The sad story of the Ashantee war may be told in a few words. On the Gold Coast, about 1,100 miles from Sierra Leone, there is the British settlement of Cape Coast Castle, the Governor being Mr. Richard Pine. There is an arrangement that if any slaves escape from Ashantee to the British settlement they are not rendered up, and there is also an extradition treaty for the rendition of criminals. It appears that a slave committed a theft, and escaped to British territory. The King of Ashantee demanded the rendition of the fugitive slave because he was a thief; Governor Pine refused to give up the thief because he was a fugitive slave. In a kind of indirect way this matter drifted into war, and we prepared for hostilities against the King of Ashantee for the protection of a friendly tribe. Everything went wrong. The reinforcements did not arrive in time, and when they did reach the Coast the unhealthy season had set in. The resources of Cape Coast Castle were inadequate for the greatly increased garrison—about 1,400 men. When the English public first heard of the war, the news was accompanied by the melancholy intelligence that the officers and men were fast dying off from disease, and that those who survived were nearly all sick. Upon this the Government promised to abandon the expedition, and to reduce the garrison at Cape Coast Castle to its usual numbers.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Lord C. Paget stated that on that day the Gladiator had been ordered to proceed to the Gold Coast to take off the sick. This statement was received with loud murmurs by the Opposition.

On Friday, Sir J. Hay, whose brother is one of the victims in this unhappy affair, moved a resolution to the effect that the want of foresight on the part of the Government had caused so large a loss of life. After an animated debate the House divided, and the numbers were:—

For the resolution	226
Against it	233
Majority for the Government .	7

The announcement of the numbers was received with cheers and counter-cheers.

CANADIAN INDIANS.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, on the vote for 1,000*l.* for the Indian Department, Canada, Mr. Hennessy called attention to the permission given by Governor Dallas to United States troops to cross the frontier and to attack the unfortunate Indians. Such permission was not in accordance with international law. Mr. Cardwell said the territory was not under the Canadian Government, but under the Hudson's Bay Company. It was true the permission had been given, but it had not been acted upon. Mr. Watkin said the Indians now at war with the United States believed themselves to be under the dominion of the British Crown. The chief of the tribe, attended by many of his people, came into the Hudson's Port, and demanded from the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Territory arms and food. Governor Dallas, while ready to give food, would not give arms, which, if used for warfare, might create difficulties with a friendly nation; but he undertook to use his friendly offices in order to procure a fair consideration of the claims of these unfortunate Indians. With this view he wrote a very excellent despatch to the Governor of Minnesota, and he received a suitable reply. Being in Canada in July last, he had gone with Governor Dallas to Lord March, when the circumstances of the case were fully before him. The reply given was that, when Lord Lyons came to Canada, the circumstances should be stated to him, but no further interference could take place. Governor Dallas had found himself in a most painful and difficult position when applied to to permit the forces of the United States to cross the frontier. Those Indians who came to him demanding arms and food were all decorated with the British medal, which they received in 1812 as allies of the British nation from 'their old father King George;' and when Minnesota was given up, they were told, if ever they required assistance, if they would only go to the north, they would always find the red flag flying. When they did apply for assistance, Governor Dallas had no military force to resist the military incursion of the United States troops, and he very unwisely, but under pressure, permitted Major Hatch to cross the frontier. Mr. Cardwell had said the permission given had not been acted upon; but from the information he (Mr. Watkin) had received he believed it had been acted upon. He was sorry to think that these old relations with the Indian tribes, rude as they might be, were being broken up, and under circumstances which must damage the prestige of the country. Mr. Blackie thought that some of the Indians had been treated with great injustice by the Canadian Government. Mr. C. Fortescue explained that the vote of 1,000*l.* was entirely for pensions to old Indians; and it was agreed to.

THE BOARD OF CHARITY COMMISSIONERS.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Ferrand, in an extremely intemperate speech, moved for a select committee to enquire into the construction, expenses, and working of the Board of Charity Commissioners. He declared that that Board was a 'gross Whig job,' and in a coarse and ungentlemanly manner spoke of the antecedents of one of the inspectors, Mr. John Simons. He did not allege that Mr. Simons has not discharged his duties, but complained that he had been, in former times, a coal merchant. Mr. Bruce, on behalf of the Government, did not deny that the subject was a fitting one for enquiry, but opposed the motion on account of the tone and language of Mr. Ferrand. On a division Mr. Ferrand's motion was rejected by a majority of 76, the numbers being 40 to 116.

THE BALLOT.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. H. Berkeley brought forward a resolution in favour of a trial of voting by ballot. After a brief discussion, it was rejected by a majority of 89.

FAILURE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S MISSION.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, on a vote for 12,500*l.* for the Zambesi expedition, Mr. Walpole asked whether this expedition was to be continued, and, if not, what was to become of the persons composing it? Mr. Layard was sorry to say that the expedition had proved a failure, and Dr. Livingstone was now coming home by way of India. The expedition would be given up altogether, and this, therefore, would be the last vote asked for. Mr. F. Powell hoped that in a matter so deeply interesting to the religious and scientific world the hon. gentleman would not content himself with such a vague, jaunty answer. Mr. Layard said that until Dr. Livingstone returned to England it would be impossible to give a full explanation to the House. Dr. Livingstone would return to this country, and Government did not think it right to spend any further money for the prosecution of the expedition. Mr. Hadfield enquired whether the failure of the expedition was to be attributed to the unfriendly feeling of the Portuguese Government. Mr. Layard could not say that it was owing to unfriendly feeling on the part of the Portuguese Government, but he believed that the slave-trading operations carried on by Portuguese colonists in a great measure tended to produce the result.

THE LONDON NEEDLEWOMEN AND TAILORS.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, Earl Granville said that the report of the Commission appointed to enquire into the sanitary condition of workrooms would be presented at the end of the session. The immediate cause of this Commission being appointed was the death of a woman employed in a West-end millinery establishment from overwork and the unhealthy arrangements of the room in which she worked. The Earl of Carnarvon said that tailors suffered from the same want of proper sanitary regulations, and that 'the waste of life which now occurred was such that, whether they looked to individuals or the community, the subject was of too much importance to be neglected.'

DAUNT'S ROCK.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Gibson said that Daunt's Rock is not to be blasted, but permission has been given to fix a bell buoy and to improve the light on Roche's Point.

LOUISIANA.—In the Confederate House of Representatives, the following resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana were presented by Mr. Villere:—'Whereas, The United States continue to wage war against the Confederate States with ruthless barbarity and an utter disregard of the rules of civilised warfare; and Whereas, The despot who wields with absolute power the destinies of that Government has manifested in all his messages and proclamations a malignant hatred of the people of the South, and a disposition to heap insult upon injury and outrage; and Whereas, This course of conduct has strengthened us in our determination to maintain our separation from the Government and people of the North; therefore,—1st. Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That the barbarous manner in which our enemies have waged war against us deserves the execrations of all men, and has confirmed and strengthened us in the determination to oppose to the last extremity a reunion with them, and that the spirit of our people is unabated in the resolution to resist every attempt at their subjugation.—2d. Be it further resolved, &c., That, relying upon the ability of our Chief Magistrate, the skill of our military leaders, the bravery of our soldiers, the heroic devotion of our women, the ardent patriotism of our men, and, above all, upon the justice of our cause, invoking the blessing of Almighty God upon our efforts, we confidently abide the result.—3d. Be it further resolved, &c., That in this hour of trial the State of Louisiana tenders to her Government and sister States her warmest sympathy and cordial cooperation; and she hereby declares her unfaltering determination to spare no expense of blood or treasure in defence of the Confederate States of America as a free and independent Republic. 4th. Be it further resolved, &c., That his Excellency the Governor be, and he is hereby requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to our senators and representatives in Congress, and to the Governors of our sister States.—J. B. ELAM, Speaker of the House of Representatives. A. H. ISAACSON, Clerk of the House of Representatives.—JOHN MOORE, President pro tem. of the Senate. Wm. F. Wagner, Secretary of the Senate.—Approved Feb. 8, 1864. HENRY W. ALLEN, Governor of the State of Louisiana.'

A MONTREAL MERCHANT IMPRISONED IN THE UNITED STATES.

(From the Montreal Herald and Daily Commercial Gazette, June 1.)

A CIRCUMSTANCE has recently transpired in the United States which involves the liberty, and seriously affects the interests, of a merchant of this city, and undoubtedly calls for prompt and decided action on the part of the British Minister at Washington. The facts relating to this matter, so far as we can learn them, will be briefly given below. On Thursday last, on the arrival of the Asia at Boston, a United States marshal came on board and arrested Mr. Samuel G. Levey, of Notre Dame Street, in this city, who was a passenger on the steamer, retaining him in his custody until the following morning, and then proceeding with him to New York. Mr. Levey telegraphed from Boston to New York to his uncle, Mr. Myers, informing him of his arrest. On his arrival there (still in custody of the United States officer), he was met by Mr. Myers, who was given to understand that on the following (Saturday) morning Mr. Levey would be brought before Major-General Dix, the Military Commander. On Saturday, instead of being brought before the General, he was placed in a cell, locked up, and no communication with his friends permitted. His papers, which had been seized also, and minutely examined, were restored to him, nothing having been discovered in them to criminate him in any manner. Mr. Myers laid the case before the British Consul in New York, who communicated with Lord Lyons on the subject; but up to the present no definite action has resulted from the communication. Mr. Levey is still imprisoned in New York. The subject is one of the most vital interest to merchants of this and other Canadian cities, who have frequent occasion to visit New York on business, and, in fact, to every British subject. If, on their arrival in New York or Boston, they can be seized and imprisoned, and held without a charge being preferred against them, their guilt or innocence becomes equally unimportant; for, if innocent, they cannot establish the fact, and the consequences of delay to a merchant will be equally disastrous whether he be innocent or guilty. Whatever may be the necessity imposed upon the United States Government by the war, to deal summarily and arbitrarily with those who owe it allegiance, the case is entirely different with regard to a British subject, who is supposed to be protected by his Government, unless he has forfeited that protection by a violation of the neutrality enjoined by his sovereign as the condition upon which it is extended over him; and to show that he has forfeited his claim to be protected by violating this neutrality a trial is necessary. That there should be no unnecessary delay in granting him a trial is his right, and a right which should be demanded by his Government; for he does not forfeit his claim to protection unless the violation of neutrality is established. We have no doubt that when the matter is fully laid before the British Minister at Washington, he will take high ground in relation to it, and will insist upon this undeniable right of a British subject to immediate trial in such a case; and that he will also extend to him that protection which every British subject has a right to claim until he is proved to have forfeited it. With reference to the case of Mr. Levey, his innocence of such crime as would be indicated by the mode of his arrest seems probable from the return of his papers, and, further, from his sentiments in relation to the struggle between the North and South. Those who should know his opinions on this subject say that his sympathies have always been with the cause of the Northern States. It will therefore be the natural conclusion of his friends here that he is the victim of ill-formed, suspicious, or perhaps malicious, agents of the Federal authorities; and it becomes a question of interest to what length the exercise of this secret agency may extend, and who may be the next victim of ignorance or malice.

(From the Montreal Evening Telegraph and Daily Commercial Advertiser, June 1, 1864.)

We give in another column the narrative of the arrest and imprisonment of Mr Samuel G. Levey, of this city, while on his return from Europe, by the Federal authorities at Boston, as furnished by that active Federal apostle and sympathiser the Montreal Herald. Our contemporary's indignant comments on this one of a hundred similar cases for which it had not a word of remonstrance, is not a little singular, and suggests the inquiry whether the investigation in this instance does not proceed less from the public wrong done, than private interest in the individual sufferer.

Mr. Levey has suffered from the vile spy system instituted and presided over here by 'that late eminent and respectable statesman' Mr. Giddings. He had not even been guilty of the crime of giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States by sympathising with the South. It is true he is a British subject, resident in a British province, but his sympathies have always been with the North; but, nevertheless, the Chief of the Federal spies set forth an edict for his punishment; and he has been punished, and will get no redress. Montreal, and every city and considerable town in Canada, swarms with Federal spies, who mark those supposed to be inimical to the Federal Government, or against whom they have any ill will, for similar treatment. These spies, many of whom claim the double privilege of being American citizens and British subjects, are well known as leading rouges, active Holton men, eminent supporters of the Herald and Witness, and they naturally feel very indignant at the Herald now turning upon them and decrying their respectable occupation, and their efforts in favour of the common cause.

GENERAL LEE'S ARMY.—A Confederate Correspondent sends to the Times an account of the opening battles of the present campaign. Under date of May 9 he writes: 'Thus General Lee has succeeded in throwing his entire army right across the path by which Grant must march if he would get "on to Richmond." He not only repulsed all his assaults at the Wilderness, but held him there until he could throw his own army in front of him. It was a masterly performance, and makes it necessary for Grant to deliver battle here, or make another effort to turn General Lee's position. The Confederates are in splendid condition, and full of spirit and cheerfulness. They all realise the importance of victory, and are ready to endure any privation necessary to its achievement. Several officers belonging to the Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments in the field, though against positive orders, procured muskets and went into the fight. They said it might possibly be the last great battle, and they desired to help to make it successful. Three of them were killed two at the Wilderness and one at this place. Is it probable that such an army can be overborne by the mercenaries who reluctantly follow at the heels of General Grant?'

THE SHAMBLES OF VIRGINIA.

(From the New York Daily News.)

NOT time to bury the dead! That, it is reported, was the answer of General Grant to the reported proposition of General Lee, that the work of destruction should cease a brief while till the dead were buried. The request and the answer are probably both fictitious. They are the substance of a mere sensation extra that was issued last evening. The despatch of Secretary Stanton amounts to a contradiction of the statement, and equally discredits the rumour of the capture of twenty thousand Confederates. But supposing the statement true, General Grant was right. There is no time to bury the dead, when day after day they are counted by thousands upon thousands. If the fiends of hell were commissioned by an angry God to wreak vengeance upon earth, they could not more terribly fulfil the mission of destruction than do the contending armies in Virginia. No marvel that the community thrills with excitement and quivers with an universal shudder. Every flash over the wires is laden with a tale of horror. The word 'victory' stares in mockery at the reader from the glaring headings of each despatch, but below there is but the record of slaughter—slaughter beyond all precedent of battle-fields, but winning nothing but the meed of heroism for those that fight this insensate quarrel.

We mark the absence of all enthusiasm at even the wildest rumours of triumph that come from the Virginian shambles; and it is no wonder, for along with them come such fearful accounts of butchery that the public heart has no room for exultation in the intensity of its agony and horror.

Could we but read the anguish and despair of the millions that have been bereaved within this week, side by side with the details that we read of the murderous strife, there would be few to clamour for a prolongation of the war. We count the mourners by millions, for the dead and wounded are being counted by the hundred thousands. The Tribune of yesterday estimated our loss thus far at forty thousand: with what has since occurred, it is a hopeful calculation that makes it seventy thousand. We claim a greater loss for the enemy; but call it equal, and there are one hundred and forty thousand victims immolated within seven days of indecisive battle.

Do you think of this, you men that worship the meek and love-ordaining Christ, and will you thirst for more blood, and have your pulpits again desecrated by furious invocations of the sword? Do you dream only of the military fruits of victory? Oh! look a little at its other hideous offspring. No need to search all over the wide North to be conscious of the desolation that the past accursed sennight has engendered. Hear at your own doors the wail of the stricken ones; count within this city's limits the innumerable mourners.

The streets were thronged, the kerchiefs waved, the shout of admiration was loud, when the Ninth Regiment of our city's best and bravest tramped gaily, boldly down Broadway, to fight the Abolition battle. In those full ranks were the youth, the manhood, the pride of New York city. Where are they now? Of the Ninth Regiment remain four officers and fifteen men.

The day will come when the authors of this war will realise their responsibility. The Abolitionist will be startled from his fanaticism by the cry of the millions who now mourn silently, but who will one day swell the inevitable chorus of broken hearts, appealing to God for vengeance upon those that wrought their sorrow.

Think not, you fanatics, and you who have filled your purses with pieces that are stained with the blood of your countrymen you who have driven your brethren like bullocks to the slaughter-pens, that you might build your fortunes and feed your ambition upon their corpses, think not that Nemesis will forget the day of reckoning. It is you, meddlers with the social system of your fellowmen; it is you, demagogues who have nursed convulsion that you might grasp power out of chaos; it is you, heartless mercenaries who are now feasting and luxuriating upon the wealth realised by your country's agony, it is you that the people will call to account in the hour of retribution.—New York News.

THE FIGHT IN CHESTERFIELD.—The following are General Beauregard's despatches: 'Headquarters, May 21 1864. To General S. Cooper:—All quiet last night. We remain in possession of the enemy's rifle pits and the ground gained by yesterday's fight, which was quite severe during part of the day, especially near Ware Bottom Church. I regret to say that General W. S. Walker is missing. It is feared he fell into the hands of the enemy while gallantly leading his troops into action.—G. T. BEAUREGARD.'—'Chester, May 22, 1864 General S. Cooper, It has just been ascertained by flag of truce that General Walker accidentally rode into the enemy's lines during the fight of the 20th instant, was requested to surrender, and was fired upon, when his horse was killed, and he was severely wounded in the foot, which required amputation. (Signed) G. T. BEAUREGARD.'—The Richmond Enquirer says: 'In relation to this fight we learn that it was one of the most brilliant affairs of the campaign. General Wise's brigade distinguished itself, together with Clingman's and others, in charging the enemy's outer line of fortifications, suffering heavily, but storming and taking the works in spite of all resistance. The enemy made two fierce assaults afterwards to regain their lost stronghold, but were repulsed each time with considerable loss. The fortifications captured by our forces comprised the strongest of the enemy's works, the line to which he retreated being weaker and less considerable. On Saturday morning our forces again commenced advancing, and steadily pressed the enemy back. He is supposed to be entirely under cover of his gunboats, now that he has been driven from his outer works, and it is supposed that his main force is embarking to go to the assistance of Grant.'

CAPTURED FEDERAL COLOURS.—The following has appeared in the Richmond papers: 'Headquarters Army Northern Virginia, on Battle-field, May 16, 1864.—Major-General C. M. Wilcox, commanding division.—General: General Lee directs me to acknowledge the receipt of the flag captured by Lane's brigade in its gallant charge of yesterday and to say that they will be forwarded to the Hon. Secretary of War, with the accompanying note, and the names of the brave captors. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant (signed) C. S. VENABLE, A. D. C. The names of the captors are: First Lieutenant J. M. Grimsby, Company K, 37th N. C. T., who brought off the colours of the 17th Michigan; Second Lieutenant O. A. Wiggins, Company E, 37th N. C. T., who brought off those of the 51st Pennsylvania; Private J. Wheeler, Company E, 18th N. C. T., who brought off those of the battery of artillery.'

BATTLES OF MANSFIELD AND PLEASANT HILL.

A CONFEDERATE ACCOUNT.

THE Houston Telegraph gives the following account of the battles of Mansfield and Pleasant Hill:—

Mansfield, Louisiana, April 13, 1864.

Editor Telegraph.—The battle of Mansfield was fought two and a half miles from the little city of the same name. The battle had been preceded by some heavy skirmishing, but the general battle commenced on April 8, about 10 A.M., Major-General Taylor in command. Major-General Green commanded the left wing, Brigadier-General Mouton the right, General Walker's division on the right of Mouton, and two cavalry regiments on the extreme right of Walker. General Green commenced the attack with a portion of his dismounted cavalry. The enemy pressing the left wing heavily, General Green then ordered Mouton's division to advance, and the fighting was terrible along the lines of both combatants.

The battle raged fiercely for five hours, when the enemy broke and fled, having been forced back two miles, where commenced a general rout. General Churchill's division did not arrive in time to participate in this action, but was in the battle on the following day. General Mouton fell early in the action, while receiving the surrender of a large body of the enemy. He fell but a few feet from the muzzles of their guns. He is reported to have acted gallantly, and his noble division lost heavily in both officers and men, and covered themselves with glory. Colonel Phil. Hébert was here wounded, and Colonel Buchel mortally—since dead. It was here, too, that the lamented Chancy E. Sheppard, of General Green's staff, fell, and the gallant Major J. D. Sayres wounded. The fruits of the victory consisted in capturing 2,500 prisoners, 322 wagons loaded with stores, 1,400 mules, and 35 ambulances, with immense medical and other stores. In this battle the enemy fought three army corps, viz., the 13th, 19th, and famous 16th, formerly commanded by General Sherman, and which had so often boasted that it had never known defeat. The loss of the enemy in the two engagements will not be less than 6,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners. The enemy commenced their retreat as soon as routed in the direction of Pleasant Hill, some eighteen miles from the battle-field of Mansfield.

Our army having pursued, the line of battle was formed about 4 P.M. on April 9, and was more bloody than on the preceding day. General Green's division, under his command, was posted on the extreme left; Mouton's division, under command of Brigadier-General Polignac, on Green's right; General Walker on Polignac's right; General Churchill's division of Arkansians and Missourians having arrived on the extreme right; the Valverde battery opening the battle and losing the majority of their horses, but few men injured. General Churchill, with his division of infantry, then moved forward, and the battle commenced furiously along the whole line. The enemy pressing Churchill in overwhelming numbers, he was compelled to fall back. Generals Walker and Polignac then moved forward, and broke the entire lines of the enemy, and threw them into a general rout, and night put a stop to the carnage. They fell back to Rebellion Bayou, some twenty miles, Green's cavalry in hot pursuit, who followed them to the river. General Walker was slightly wounded. So was General Scurry. (General Polignac was not wounded, as first reported.)

General Waul was in command of a brigade, and every man, both officers and privates, served like heroes. Colonel De Bray (since promoted as Brigadier-General) is reported to have behaved very gallantly. He had his horse killed under him here. Our loss was very heavy. General Scurry took 1,200 men into the fight, and lost 400 killed and wounded. Our loss in the two battles is estimated to be 1,400 killed, wounded, and about 100 prisoners. We captured in the two battles 32 pieces of artillery, and small arms beyond computation, and about 4,000 prisoners, many officers among them. These are the greatest battles fought west of the Mississippi, and of all the victories the most fruitful. The invasion of Texas is no longer to be thought of, and probably the complete evacuation of Western Louisiana by the enemy, besides relieving the pressure on Arkansas, which General Price may be enabled to regain. I should here state that General Taylor fought these battles contrary to the opinion of others, and he has eclipsed the fame of his father, old 'Rough and Ready.' I yesterday visited the different hospitals in this vicinity, seeking some of our Texas boys. I found but a few. I found Major Sayers and Captain T. J. Hare, of Company K, De Bray's regiment; they are not dangerously wounded; also Dr. Fisher, of the same regiment, slightly wounded. I shall proceed to Pleasant Hill in a day or two, and seek others.

The streets of this city are daily thronged with the ladies carrying food and comfort to the sufferers. They watch over them with all the affection of mothers and sisters. Surrounded by all the horrors of war, the daughters of Louisiana prove ministering angels in the cause of suffering humanity, and, like the good Samaritan, they never tire in watching at the couch of suffering. God bless them! The majority of the wounded of the enemy are in our hands; they are attended by their own surgeons, and our authorities give them every facility to assist them, and they receive as kind treatment as those of our own army.

This is a sad night in the camp; a few rods from where I am writing, lies the corpse of Major-General Thomas Green, the Napoleon of the West. Many a heart in Texas will mourn the loss of our hero. Just promoted, having never known defeat when he commanded, enjoying the confidence of his troops to a degree unsurpassed, and very rarely equalled, with a constitution of iron, and a will like adamant, General Green leaves a void in the armies of the Confederacy which will remain unfilled, and future generations of Texans will tell of the heroic deeds, and the no less heroic death, of the man who first led cow-boys to board and capture vessels of war. Major-General Green was killed instantly, about three o'clock on the evening of the 12th inst., at Blair's Landing, on Red River, about twenty-five miles from this place, when directing an attack with 1,500 men on five gunboats and five transports, the latter loaded with troops, the former ironclads. He was standing near the edge of the bank, which at that place is about thirty feet high. While encouraging his men, under a terrific fire from the gunboats, he was struck over the right eye by a charge of grape shot—the whole top of his head was carried away, and death, of course, instantaneous. His body was brought to the camp the next day, and will be sent to Texas by J. H. Bosk, Quartermaster of the Cavalry Corps.

The tent is lighted up and guarded by a detachment of Texas cavalry. The sensation caused by his death it is impossible to describe. Generals Polignac, Waul and Scurry shed burning tears when they heard of it. Everyone seemed to have lost a near and dear relative and friend. General Taylor was overwhelmed with grief, for Green had always been his true and staunch friend. I am told that he said, when his officers remonstrated against his going into the fight himself, that he wouldn't if he had his old brigade, but some of the troops were new and he must go. The troops engaged were Wood's and Gould's regiments, and Parson's brigade. We lost 75 men killed and wounded. The slaughter of the enemy on board the transports was fearful, as our men were only thirty or forty yards from them, and one of the gunboats was completely silenced and about to surrender, when three others came to her assistance; none were captured. Had General Green lived, no one doubts but what he would have captured all the transports. The engagement lasted about half an hour after the General fell, when the officer who took command withdrew the troops. Such is the statement of officers who were there. Texas also mourns the loss of Chancy B. Sheppard. I knew him well. He was a true friend, and a braver man did not fall on those bloody fields. The hero of a dozen fights, he now sleeps with his old chief in a soldier's grave. Peace to his ashes, but his memory will for ever remain green in the heart of every Texan.

Near Grand Ecore, April 17.

Major-General Prince Polignac, second in command to General Taylor, is not injured in the least, and now commands in the field. Brigadier-General Bee, being second to him, is in command of all the cavalry in West Louisiana. As the fact of my being with a majority of the Texas troops at present will not be considered contraband to publish in your paper, it being so far distant, I will state that I have met with many of the heroes of the late battles, and never have I seen them in better spirits, despite their late hardships. The losses among the Texans are not so severe as at first reported. Our boys, when they went into the fight, did their work up quick. It was charge and sabre from first to last. The wounded are all doing well, and receive every attention from the ladies of the country. Skirmishing is going on daily, and a few prisoners brought in. They all admit that they were badly whipped the other day, and say that the 'Texas fellows' fought like tigers. We fought the flower of the United States army; and I must say that the Western men acted bravely, but they could not stand the Texan yell and fearful charge. The loss of the enemy in officers is very large, many being among the wounded.

The field of Mansfield was a plantation, skirted with woods, and composed of small hills and valleys. It contains some three or four hundred acres of open land, but much of the hardest fighting took place in the timber where the enemy were. The fences had been levelled by the enemy upon hearing of General Taylor's advance, expecting to take us by surprise and slaughter our troops on the open plain. The annals of history do not record a harder contested field. Thousands of dead horses are strewn all over the field, and the stench is horrible. I was forced to run my pony at the height of his speed over many portions. The majority of our troops who fell were buried in the city cemetery, while those of the enemy were buried upon the field. They were buried in trenches, side by side, as decently as possible.

When our cavalry pursued, after their rout, hundreds were cut down, and all along the road to Pleasant Hill, twenty miles, is strewn with the carcasses of dead horses, and occasionally a new-made grave is seen by the road-side. The battle-field of Pleasant Hill extends for the distance of a mile from the town. The enemy had made a stand on the top of a high hill, one mile from the town. Planting their batteries, they awaited the approach of our pursuing forces. As soon as their scouts gave warning that our cavalry were in range, they opened a brisk fire in every direction. Our batteries having got into position, the old Valverde opened and soon silenced their main battery, killing nearly all their horses, while De Bray, at the head of his regiment, charged up the hill, followed by Burchell, the enemy turning and retreating. The Arkansians and Missourians, under General Churchill, the Louisianians, under Polignac, and the cavalry of Green, threw them into a complete rout.

I was misinformed when I stated in my last letter that Colonel Burchell fell on the field of Mansfield; it was here that he fell. Many of our killed were buried on the field in separate graves. Our loss in killed was not near as large as that of the enemy. The enemy's line of battle extended several regiments deep along the whole line of battle, and when our batteries opened the slaughter was horrible. The battle was fought on ground much like that of Mansfield, but they had many advantages. Ditches had been cut by the owner of the plantation for the purpose of drainage, and the enemy used them as rifle pits, but they were soon driven from them by the separate assaults of the infantry. The last of the series of these hills and ditches extended up to and was a part of the town. But few horses, comparatively, were killed here, but the slaughter of the enemy was fearful. The dead are buried together in scores. I could trace with my eyes the spots where the most desperate carnage had taken place.

In the Saddle, near Grand Ecore, La., April 19, 1864.

All is still bustle and excitement at the front. Slight skirmishing going on daily. A flag of truce, borne by Colonel G. W. Chilton, and Major G. W. McNeel, of General Bee's staff, held communication with the enemy a short time ago. The Federals desired to send supplies and surgeons to their wounded, and we agreed to receive and receipt for the stores, but would not let their surgeons pass into our lines. The Federal truce officer, who was a Colonel, paid a high compliment to the bravery of our troops on the field, and acknowledged the defeat. He was courteous and gentlemanly towards our officers. A reconnoitering party, composed of two companies of De Bray's regiment, commanded by Lieutenants Story and Peck, of Companies B and F, made a daring dash into the city of Natchitoches on the evening of the 15th inst. They passed through a portion of the town, driving in the pickets of the enemy. The main body of the enemy are between the upper portion of the town and the town of Grand Ecore. This feat is considered a brilliant one. A portion of Colonel Madison's regiment, of General Major's brigade, have also made many daring reconnoissances of late.

Every man seemed to endeavour to outdo his comrades in deeds of valour. And while I give proper credit to our brave Texans, I must not overlook the gallant Louisianians under the intrepid Mouton, or the Arkansians and Missourians under Churchill. Side by side did they advance to the terrible charges, and now fill the same graves. The Louisianians under Mouton covered themselves with glory, the far-famed Crescent Regiment, of New Orleans, leading in the charges: this noble band of men have passed through many severe fights. I saw them on the field of Shiloh, and even there they held in check an entire brigade of the enemy on Monday morning after the enemy had been reinforced by General Buell. Their loss on the field of Mansfield was terrible; entire platoons fell at every discharge of the enemy's guns; they advanced across an open field without firing a gun, until they had reached within a few yards of the enemy, when they opened and soon drove the enemy in a perfect rout from their position. The division of General Churchill marched forty-five miles in fifteen hours to be in time for the fight at Pleasant Hill; nobly did they stand side by side with their comrades through that bloody struggle, and their graves on the battle-field tell plainly how they suffered.

I stated in my first letter that General Taylor made the attack without orders from General Smith, and contrary to the advice of many officers. But the General knew the spirit of his troops, and knowing the topography of the country as well, risked a battle, and has thereby saved Texas from the perils of an invasion. While we extol our own heroes of the battles, Texas must not forget Taylor, Mouton, Polignac, or Churchill. One of the greatest heroes of those fields was Brigadier-General Bee, commanding a brigade of cavalry on the extreme left, at Pleasant Hill. He had two horses shot under him, and himself slightly wounded. Major G. W. McNeel, Inspector-General on his staff, had two horses shot under him, and Orderly L. Schneider had two shot while carrying General Bee's orders on the field. Major W. T. Mechling, A. A. G., and Colonel G. W. Chilton, are reported to have acted nobly in the terrible charge where the gallant Colonel Buchel fell mortally wounded. Nor must I forget the intrepid Brigadier-General C. P. Majors; he was with the lamented Green throughout, and it would be useless for me to go into details of his acts. Suffice it to say that he won fresh laurels here. Loud are the praises I hear of the gallantry displayed by Captain McMahan's battery of light artillery. At Mansfield the battery was in position on the summit of a hill, and poured a deadly volley into the ranks of the enemy. General Taylor presented two rifled captured pieces to the battery on the field, they laying aside their smooth-bore guns. Lieutenant Sam. Houston, jun., commanded one section of the battery, and is reported to have acted the hero, directing the guns with his own hands.

The slaughter of the enemy at Pleasant Hill is described by old soldiers to have been the greatest they ever saw. Whole regiments fell like chaff before the wind, and the piles of buried dead on the field show plainly the extent of the carnage. I have noticed that those regiments which are well-drilled and disciplined do far better service in action. The road, after leaving Mansfield to this place, is strewn with dead horses which fell by the pursuit of our cavalry. Many of the stately residences along the route are blackened ruins, the fences destroyed by fire, and a scene of desolation and devastation is seen on every side. I had formerly believed that many of the stories of the burning of dwellings, robberies of churches, &c., were exaggerated. But after seeing these things with my own eyes, I am now satisfied they are true. A Catholic church in the Spanish settlement, near Double Bayou Bridge, was sacked, and the church ornaments carried away; even the window curtains were taken. This cannot be denied. In the knapsack of one of the 13th Army Corps was found the jewellery of a young lady. Earrings, breastpins, and even her under-clothing was there. I will do the enemy the justice to say that the orders of their Generals severely punish outrages of this kind, but many of the inferior officers encourage their men to these acts, and even share with them in the spoils.

I never saw so much sorrow as I see shown by the cavalry corps of the army of Louisiana for the loss of Major-General Green. The following General Order from General Bee expresses the general feeling of the corps:—

'General Orders, No. 1.

'Head-quarters Cavalry Corps,
Prother's Bridge, La., April 15, 1864.

'Around the bier of Major-General Tom Green, killed in action April 12, 1864, at Blair's Landing, Louisiana, this corps claims its place as chief mourner. It has shared with him his trials and sufferings, his glory and honour. It mourns him as its incomparable leader, one of the most effective Generals in the service of the Confederacy. A nation mourns. He has left the remembrance of his noble example for our guidance. It will not be forgotten.

'In compliance with orders from Major-General Taylor, I assume command of the cavalry of this army. Head-quarters are at present at Prother's Bridge.

'H. P. BEE,
'Brigadier-General Commanding.

'William P. Mechling, A.A.G.'

All keep their horses saddled night and day, ready to move at a moment's warning. The boys who have never been on a campaign find it anything but play, and far different from doing garrison duty. The weather is warm and pleasant.

A joint resolution has been introduced into the Confederate Congress, thanking Major-General Richard Taylor and his command 'for the brilliant successes obtained by them over the enemy in their campaigns in Louisiana during the past year, and particularly for the victory at Mansfield and Pleasant Hill.'

THE COTTON PURCHASED BY THE CONFEDERATE GOVERNMENT.—The Mobile Register of May 1 says: 'We are informed by the agent, J. D. B. De Bow, Esq., that up to the present time Government has lost by the acts of the enemy, by military burnings, accidents of various sorts, and unavoidable wear and tear, about one-fourth of its purchases in Mississippi. This will be regarded unimportant when it is considered that almost the only losses which have so far been met with are in Mississippi, growing out of the advance and proximity of the enemy. The cotton in this State cost on an average about $50 per bale, and could now be readily parted with for $250, payable in the new issue, which goes to show that the cotton remaining on hand will not only indemnify all the losses, but leave a margin of profit, if disposed of to-day, of about twenty-five millions of dollars. What is true of Mississippi, which has sustained such disasters, will be true in a compounded ratio for the other cotton States. This is the best vindication of the policy of cotton purchases by the Government, though that policy has been abundantly subserved in our foreign operations.'

DYING.—Mr. Doolittle lately said in the Federal Congress: 'Slavery, Mr. President, is dying all around us.' On this the Dayton Empire remarks: 'Yes! Our Constitutional Liberty is dying; morality, public and private, is dying; all that we have prized of peace, of social order, of neighbourly kindness, of friendly intercourse in society, is dying. And dying, too, by hundreds of thousands, are the brothers, fathers, sons, of this most frenzied, deluded, and miserable people. Why did not Mr. Doolittle tell it all, while he was about it?'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1864.

Another Flank Movement.

THERE seems to be very little doubt that General GRANT has made up his mind to adopt another line of advance upon Richmond, and that the next mail will bring us the intelligence of a still closer imitation of M'CLELLAN's strategy, and another change of base. Defeated at Spottsylvania, foiled at Saxton's Junction, defeated again on the Chickahominy, the Federal commander has evidently resolved upon trying a new point in the Confederate armies; and everything tends to prove that his next move will be towards the James River. General M'CLELLAN perseveringly maintained that the James River route was the real road to Richmond, though it is only fair to say that he never proved its advantages, and only discovered them when every other route had failed, and when it was too late to try the new one. General GRANT has trodden so closely in his footsteps that it is perfectly natural he should try his predecessor's 'forlorn hope,' and to the last moment delude the North into the belief that he is bent upon marching into Richmond. At the same time, there is a suggestive weakness in this change of base which implies far more anxiety about a safe retreat than an easy advance, and we shall begin to think, when once GRANT's march across the Chickahominy to the James River is announced, that the end of the campaign is not very distant. We are, of course, very much in the dark as to the result of the recent operations on the north bank of the Chickahominy. All Southern reports are carefully excluded from Northern newspapers. The correspondence from the army is carefully edited by Mr. STANTON's subordinates. Federal victories are magnified, Federal reverses are dwarfed, and everything is narrated in the tone most calculated to help Mr. LINCOLN's chances for the Presidential election. Take the battle of the 3rd instant. It is now admitted that a general action was fought on that day—that the Federals attacked LEE's lines with their whole force, and were repulsed with frightful loss. It is even asserted that at one moment they held the key of the position, but that GRANT, unwilling to reap a victory which would cost him a great loss of life, withdrew after three hours' engagement and the loss of 7,000 men. Yet that action was described in a previous mail as a mere reconnaissance in force, which cost two or three colonels and 'loss not very severe,' although it really amounted to a defeated attempt to force LEE's lines and drive his whole army into Richmond. It is difficult, then, to guess what confidence is to be placed in the reports of the New York papers, or in Mr. STANTON's despatches; but if we take their own accounts, and draw our opinions from them, we shall probably not be far wrong in deciding that the battle of the 3rd was conclusive as to the campaign on the Chickahominy, and rendered GRANT's change of base an actual necessity.

The question arises for what point GRANT will make. He is, as usual, moving by his left, and is reported to have reached Despatch Station on the Chickahominy. This would seem to imply an intention of taking up a position somewhat nearer to Richmond than Harrison's Landing, and in advance of BUTLER's lines. But we are inclined to believe that if GRANT does make for the James River, his line of march will be nearly identical with the route adopted by M'CLELLAN. In that case he will have arrived on the north bank of the James River almost on the same day of the year as his predecessor, and his army will be subjected to precisely the same malarious influences which decimated M'CLELLAN's forces. Bad water, marsh miasmata, and a Virginian July sun would speedily dispose of his army without the necessity of a blow from LEE. But M'CLELLAN's army, even after the seven days' fighting, was formidable. LEE's forces, although victorious, had suffered heavily, and were not in a condition to follow up their victory. Things are different now. Every week adds to LEE's strength. Richmond is secured against a coup de main; and since the advance upon Richmond is restricted to a single route, LEE can afford to trust very much to the defences of the Southern capital, and make use of his available forces for a blow that would speedily compel LINCOLN to think more of defending Washington than of taking Richmond. As it is, there is nothing to prevent a Confederate force marching to the Potomac. Confederate guerillas are virtually in possession of the country from Arlington Heights to the northern line of Richmond. If LEE can spare the men, he has already an opportunity of dealing a blow which will be as useful for the defence of Richmond as another successful repulse of GRANT's army. But it is said to be the Federal General's plan to establish himself on both banks of the James River, to advance, à la HALLECK, a mile a week, by the aid of the spade; and by means of his superiority of cavalry to cut the communications of Richmond, and compel LEE to evacuate Richmond, without risking the failure of an assault. Really there is no end to the ingenuity of Federal strategists. The attack, which began on the north side of Richmond, is now to be transferred to the south side. The route which was so obviously the only safe advance to Richmond is to be abandoned, and a new line immeasurably superior is to be adopted; and all the time the Northern press is in ecstasies over the generalship of GRANT, and implicitly believes that Richmond will fall, like Jericho at the blast of a trumpet, so soon as GRANT arrives before its walls. For our own part, we are of opinion that the further GRANT moves to the south, the more feeble must be his hope of reaching Richmond; that every mile he places between his army and Washington is a gain to the Confederates; and that we shall soon hear of combinations of the Confederate troops, which will effectually relieve Richmond for many months to come.

SHERMAN's prospects are not more favourable than those of the army in Virginia. In Georgia, also, the Federal army has suffered defeat and loss. In two battles the Confederates have taken the initiative. In one the Federals claim a victory, in the other they acknowledge a defeat. A frightful list of killed and wounded and sick has been sent northwards. Southern reports already place at 45,000 the casualties in SHERMAN's army from one cause or another. And we learn from Northern sources that the advance has ceased; that JOHNSTON, reinforced by POLK and FINNEGAN, has turned to bay; that the news of the capture of Marietta is false; and that before SHERMAN can hope to settle down to the siege of Atlanta, he has to fight an army of 60,000 men, commanded by one of the best officers in the Confederate army occupying an immensely strong position. From Chattanooga to Ackworth the distance is 120 miles. A single line of railway is all SHERMAN has to depend on for his supplies; and FORREST, with a large cavalry force, is said to be making for his communications. It is contrary to all experience that SHERMAN's army should succeed, and we believe a very short time will elapse before SHERMAN repeats the retrograde movement he made in the spring in the State of Mississippi. In the meantime the Confederates are astir in Kentucky; they are threatening Cincinnati; they have destroyed four gunboats and several transports on the Mississippi: and they are gradually acquiring quite a respectable fleet by captures in Southern waters. The Federals have sacrificed everything for the capture of Richmond and Atlanta. At present they have achieved no success to compensate them for the territory they have abandoned and the losses they have endured.

The Alabama.

THE story of the Alabama is told, and the gallant little vessel, which has almost alone flaunted the Confederate flag in every ocean to the terror of Yankee skippers, now lies a wreck, some fathoms deep, midway between the coast of Brittany and the island of Alderney. Only a few days ago the Alabama put into Cherbourg to refit. She was terribly in need of repairs. Her boilers were worn out, her machinery faulty, her copper started, in some places a foot from her frame, her hull terribly foul with weeds. And, with his ship in this condition, her Captain came to the one neutral Power which had the courage to stand by its neutrality, and requested permission to thoroughly overhaul and refit her. The Federal cruisers were soon informed of her arrival, and the Kearsage, which had been fitting at Ostend, steamed off at once for Cherbourg. Arrived off the port, she found the Alabama still afloat. There are no private docks at Cherbourg. There was some delay in the compliance with Captain SEMMES's request on the part of the local authorities, and the commander of the Kearsage, it is said, at once sent in a challenge. Whether a verbal challenge passed or not we do not know. But the defiance to combat was not the less openly given. Steaming slowly outside the breakwater, hoisting his colours, firing guns to invite attention, Captain WINSLOW left no doubt about his wish for a fight, and Captain SEMMES was not the man to baulk him. It may be said, with some show of justice, that the latter was not bound to accept the challenge; that the Alabama had other services to render; and that to risk her in her then condition against an adversary so far superior in all the conditions of success was rashness in the extreme. But there were many reasons to make it almost imperative to fight. The Confederate cruisers had been represented by their enemies as bold only by evasion, and safe only by their steaming powers. It was denied that they were fighting ships, and insinuated that they would never risk a fair combat. What would have been said had the Alabama declined the challenge—had she remained securely at anchor between the breakwater, with the Kearsage, nominally her equal in strength, daring her to come out, and announcing to all the world that ship for ship the Confederate navy was afraid to face its adversaries? In this war, on sea or on land, the Confederates have never counted odds. It could hardly have been expected that Captain SEMMES would be the first to calculate them. Circumstances justified, nay required, his acceptance of the challenge; no naval officer in any service would have dared to refuse it. The sinking of the Hatteras, herself a larger ship than the Alabama, shows that there was reasonable ground for Captain SEMMES's confidence in his brave little craft and her gallant crew. Her loss is a misfortune; but better far that she has gone down with honour than that the Captain of the Kearsage should have had it in his power to boast that he had challenged the Alabama, and the Alabama prudently declined to fight.

It was on Sunday morning, the 19th inst., that the Alabama steamed slowly out to the encounter. It was known in Paris the day previously that SEMMES would go out, and men came from Paris by train to witness the sea fight between the famous rover of the seas and the Kearsage. As she passed the end of the mole, a great shout of 'God speed' rent the air, and as it died away, the drums were heard beating to quarters. The iron-plated frigate La Couronne accompanied her to the limit of the French waters, a small English steam yacht, the Deerhound, followed in her wake, and at about eight miles from Cherbourg the action began. The first shot was fired by the Alabama, at the distance of about a mile, and was immediately responded to by the Kearsage. And so for one hour in lessening circles the combat was sustained. It was the object of Captain SEMMES to board his adversary. His inferiority in the weight of metal made 'long bowls' a dangerous game for him to play, and he sought from the first to close. The Captain of the Kearsage, however, knew his advantage, and, relying on his longer range and larger calibre, avoided any attempt to grapple. And the disadvantage under which the Alabama laboured was soon apparent. The Kearsage beat her in speed, her rate of steaming during the action being estimated at three knots an hour above that of her opponent, so that Captain WINSLOW chose his own position and easily frustrated the Alabama's manœuvres. Throughout the action the starboard batteries were principally used. It was noticed on board the Deerhound that the Alabama fired far more rapidly, and with greater accuracy, but that the shells of the Kearsage did the more damage. And so for nearly one hour the two antagonists exchanged their deadly missiles, the Alabama to the last trying to close, and her opponent as constantly keeping her at her own distance and pouring in her 11-inch shell with fatal precision. Towards the end of the action SEMMES made a last effort to reach the Kearsage, but it failed; a shell carried away one of the fans of the screw and a part of the rudder, another went through her boilers and put out her fires. It was all over. Sail was hoisted, but to no purpose. Slowly the sea gained upon her, and still more fiercely the Kearsage concentrated her fire upon her. Finally, her flag was struck; the sea crept over her stern and up her deck. Her crew jumped into the sea, supporting themselves by portions of the wreck, spars, &c.; and then came the end: her bows lifting from the waves, her bowsprit perpendicular, the Alabama went down to her last resting-place. The Deerhound, whose owner with great pluck had stood by throughout the action, at once bore rapidly down to pick up the crew, and succeeded in saving the Captain, 13 officers, and 27 seamen. Between 60 and 80 were subsequently rescued by the boats of La Couronne, the Kearsage, and some French pilot-boats, leaving a balance of some 25 or 30 to be accounted for by the known casualties of the action and the depths of the sea.

The Kearsage possessed every single advantage in this unequal fight—speed, strength, numbers, and weight of metal. Her boilers were in perfect order, her hull clean, and the most exposed portions of her frame had been strengthened by heavy chain cables, constituting a very efficient sort of armour plating. Her crew consisted of 200 men to 120 on board the Alabama; her armament, compared to that of her adversary, was as 204 to 84, or five to two; for she carried ten heavy 11-inch Dahlgren guns, whilst the Alabama had only one Blakeley 100-pounder, one smooth bore pivot gun, and six broadside ordinary 32-pounders. Under these circumstances, we are justified in calling the fight an unequal one, but as the combat might have been declined it is too late to urge this as an explanation of defeat. The Federals have gained no glory by their success. The Confederate flag has sustained no dishonour. It is at the worst ship for ship, the Alabama for the Hatteras. We could have wished to see her once more roving the seas, but it was not to be. As it was her fate to end her career so soon, it is well she met it so bravely, gaining, in that last hour of mortal conflict, just that element of fame which will make her memory imperishable, and lay a splendid foundation for the future glories of the Confederate navy. Peace to the gallant little Alabama! Peace to the brave who went down in her! Honour to the captain, and officers, and crew, who, undaunted by odds, careless of life, resolute in defence of the honour of the flag they had so long carried triumphantly over every sea, fought their vessel to the last, and have lived, we trust, to refight their battles under more favourable conditions, and with a very different result!

The Presidential Campaign in the United States.

IN the midst of what seems to Europe and America to be the crisis of the great war, when the armies of LEE and GRANT, and JOHNSTON and SHERMAN, confront each other, while the losses of battles are counted by tens of thousands, and gold rises to double the value of greenbacks, the Federal States are entering upon another conflict of scarcely less interest and importance than that of the armies in the field. The political parties and factions of the North are marshalling their hosts; shoddy has taken the field for LINCOLN, Red Republican Radicalism has chosen FREMONT for its standard-bearer, while war democrats and peace democrats are looking forward to the Chicago battle-field, and considering whether they will take M'CLELLAN with his balanced account of failure and success, or look for a hero of more recent date and brilliant achievements.

The presidential campaign cannot be considered as fairly open until all the candidates are in the field; but the movements already made are of the highest importance. Whatever may be done by the Democratic Convention yet to meet at Chicago, which will probably choose between M'CLELLAN and GRANT, if the latter is not defeated and thrown out of the field, we have the chief elements of the coming contest in the nomination of the candidates, and the adoption of the platforms of the two great factions of the dominant Republican party. The nomination of General FREMONT at Cleveland was a declaration of war against the LINCOLN Administration and policy, which, to all appearance, will be fought out to the bitter end. General FREMONT has accepted the nomination in a letter apparently written, and undoubtedly revised, in the editorial rooms of the New York Tribune. He made his acceptance conditional upon the nomination of Mr. LINCOLN, an event which has already transpired; and to show that he was in earnest, he resigned his commission in the army, that he might be free to fight the political battle with his opponent. Mr. FREMONT does not lack energy or ambition. He has education and talent. What is more, he has a grievance, and he is the chosen leader of a party which considers itself deeply aggrieved. This party plants itself upon the platform of 'free speech, a free press, and free men.' It denounces the unconstitutional usurpations and abuses of the LINCOLN Government; imprisonment in the North, and confiscation in the South; proposes the abolition of slavery by a Constitutional provision, and the maintenance of the MONROE doctrine with respect to Mexico, and the right of asylum so shamefully violated in the recent case of the Spaniard ARGUELLES. It goes further than this, in the intentions of leaders, if not in formal resolutions. The FREMONT party means to destroy the Federal Constitution and the sovereignty of the States, and create a nation by revolutionizing the North and conquering the South. This platform and its candidates, FREMONT and COCHRANE, have the support of the Radicals, the Abolitionists, and the great body of the Germans. The Cleveland Convention, and the candidacy of FREMONT are not protests against the war, but very energetic ones against the Government, and the manner in which the war has been conducted.

The renomination of Mr. LINCOLN at the Baltimore Convention was a 'cut and dried' proceeding. It was a convention of office holders and shoddy contractors, managed by the wire-pullers of the Government, and receiving its orders from Washington. It did what it was appointed to do—no more and no less. Its platform was no doubt modified by that of the Cleveland Convention. It was compelled to accept the MONROE doctrine as an awkward plank, which might prove troublesome to stand upon, but could not be dispensed with. The 'bogus' delegations of Federal office holders and negroes from Florida, South Carolina, and other Confederate States acted as supernumeraries in the great farce of LINCOLN'S nomination, which might have been just as well accomplished by proclamation.

The persons nominated as candidates for the office of vice-president may be worthy of a passing notice. Mr. COCHRANE, nominated as Vice-President on the FREMONT ticket, was, just before the outbreak of the war, a noisy state-rights democrat, who, while the question of secession was pending at Richmond, made a speech there asserting it as the right of Virginia to withdraw from the Federal Union, and pledging New York to raise 100,000 men to stand between the South and any attempt at coercion; yet the war of coercion had no sooner begun than he took a commission as Brigadier-General under Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON, who is to run as candidate for the vice-presidency on the ticket with Mr. LINCOLN, was, at the age of twenty-one, a journeyman tailor, and unable to read. It is to his credit that he so far educated himself as to become a Member of Congress from Tennessee, Governor, and Senator; but his nomination is the reward of treason to the State that covered him with honours. He has been the military governor of so much of the State as has been held by the Federal forces, and the ready tool of Federal despotism, whose nomination would increase, if that were possible, Confederate resistance to a country governed by miscreants and traitors.

The democratic party has wisely postponed its nominating convention. Its choice would be General M'CLELLAN were there not the possibility, perhaps the faint hope, of a stronger availability in General GRANT, who is at this moment the rock ahead for LINCOLN and FREMONT, and all other candidates. If GRANT, at any time before the election in November, could succeed in taking Richmond, he would be nominated by acclamation and elected without opposition. If such a success came before the Chicago Convention, GRANT would be its nominee, as the only available candidate, and LINCOLN and FREMONT would be alike abandoned. GRANT plans and fights for more than Richmond; but LINCOLN knows well that GRANT'S success would be his ruin. It therefore seems to be well understood that no immediate success is to be expected. The Northern papers are talking of long sieges and a second Sebastopol. The veteran troops whose time expires march home from the camps of the Chickahominy, with the music of Confederate cannon in their rear; and there is no danger of any victories that can endanger the prospects of Mr. LINCOLN, or that need trouble the partisans of M'CLELLAN. Mr. LINCOLN has not taken the trouble to be renominated, with the risk of being thrown off the course by his Lieutenant-General, whose success is considered so doubtful in New York, that a meeting called to sustain him the other day was a decided failure.

The contest is, to present appearance, between LINCOLN and FREMONT, with the chance of the election of M'CLELLAN, unless the democrats shall also be divided. Mr. LINCOLN hopes, in case of a persistent opposition in his own party, to carry the election into the House of Representatives, where each of his 'bogus' States would have a vote, and his squad of contractors and negroes from a Florida sandbar would count the same as the great States of New York or Ohio with their millions of population. He has the army and the votes of the soldiers; and he can, probably, put as effectual an extinguisher on the hopes of General GRANT as he has upon the pretensions of BANKS and BUTLER. Mr. RAYMOND, of the New York Times, author of a life of Mr. LINCOLN and prominently named as a candidate for the Vice-Presidency, advocates the re-election of Mr. LINCOLN on the ground that it will require four years more for him to complete the 'big job' he has undertaken.

Meantime, whatever may be the result of the political campaign, it is a diversion in favour of the Confederacy. It is not only that no Federal general can be allowed to gain a brilliant success, even if he were able to do so, lest the populace should insist on making him President, but that for four months the whole North will be divided into hostile camps against itself, and its thoughts, feelings, and energies diverted from the war against the Confederate States. Passion and hatred will find scope at home. LINCOLN will think more of beating FREMONT than of taking Richmond. There will be war upon the Administration in thousands of presses and public meetings. The Government that wants votes will postpone conscriptions. As FREMONT has resigned, his partisans are not likely to volunteer. The Democrats will not fight for LINCOLN, when they hope in a few months to be under the leadership of M'CLELLAN.

The war upon LINCOLN in public speeches and by the press bids fair to exceed in virulence anything even in American political contests. The New York World, a leading Democratic paper, in its issue of June 7, gives an earnest of what is coming. It says of the PRESIDENT and COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF:—

> As a man, his instincts are vulgar, his education narrow, his manners a cross between boor and buffoon. As a statesman, he is incapable, vacillating, a time-server, without either wise comprehension of the present or sagacious forecast of the future. As an administrator, he selects the unfittest instruments for the most important functions, and after the clearest demonstrations of their incapacity, he has not decision of character to replace them by men of energy and ability. . . . Besides the feebleness and incapacity which, in a great crisis, are as calamitous as crimes, Mr. Lincoln is obnoxious to public censure by his treachery to the most cherished principles of liberty.

These declarations will be repeated and intensified in a thousand newspapers, and in thousands of stump orations.

The war between LINCOLN and FREMONT is deeper and more genuine than many even in the Federal States imagine. Mr. GREELEY, probably the most influential politician in those States, has not given his public adhesion to FREMONT, but his partiality for him is as well known as his hatred to Mr. SEWARD and his dislike of LINCOLN. Mr. BEECHER, in the Independent, holds a similar non-committent position, but, in case of the failure of GRANT, is prepared to support FREMONT. Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS has freely declared his preferences. Four years of high-handed abuse of irresponsible power, without the prestige of success, must have made enemies to the Administration, and there is not a man who has been injured or even neglected by the Government who will not at the first opportunity turn against it. There is a large army of office-holders to vote for LINCOLN, if they believe he can be reelected; but there is a vastly larger army of office-seekers sure to vote against him; and for four months the great body of Federal Americans of all parties will be more intent upon electing their candidates and beating their opponents than on wasting their lives in the swamps of the Chickahominy or on the plains of Georgia.

Warm and Friendly Neutrality.

THE very able paper in which the commander of the Alabama has explained his conduct and set forth his defence, must give rise to serious and not very pleasant reflections in the minds of those Englishmen who are more solicitous for the honour of their country than afraid of any consequences which the perseverance of an honest and impartial course might have entailed. It is impossible to read the statement of Captain SEMMES without perceiving that, in her anxiety to avoid a disagreeable controversy with the Federal Government, England has been led to adopt a policy which has inflicted grave inconvenience on the weaker and defensive belligerent, and rendered material assistance to the stronger and the aggressor.' And it can hardly be thought that the adoption of such a line of action is consistent with that sincere and impartial neutrality professed by HER MAJESTY'S Government, or that its motives are entirely creditable to those by whom it was determined on and enforced. Our duty was to render no assistance to either party, except in the ordinary way of trade, which our subjects—already sufficiently injured by the interruption of the cotton supply—could hardly be expected to forego, and to render this assistance impartially to both parties. If it can be shown that we have adopted a policy which has protected the vulnerable point of the North, while affording no countervailing advantage to the South, it is proved that we have departed from our duty, and have not faithfully and loyally observed our original promise of an earnest and strict impartiality.

The North was not, like the South, vulnerable by land. It is true that raids have been made on Northern soil, and that, if such had been the pleasure of the Confederate Government and Generals, LEE in Pennsylvania and MORGAN in Ohio might have inflicted a considerable amount of local injury and suffering. But this could not be done on a sufficient scale to bring home to the feelings of the Northern people a sense of the sufferings and horrors of war. In the first place, the superior numbers of the Federal armies were from the first adequate to compel the enemy, at almost every point, to stand solely upon the defensive. In the second, the early successes obtained by the Federals, by treachery and not by arms, interposed between the Confederates and those on whom they might fairly have revenged their wrongs, a broad belt of territory inhabited by families of Confederate principles, though occupied and controlled by Yankee forces. Maryland and Kentucky might have been ravaged as Virginia and Tennessee have been; but the injury would have fallen on the friends, not on the enemies, of the South; and Ohio and Pennsylvania were protected from vengeance by the occupation of Maryland and Kentucky. Thus, while the Confederacy was vulnerable by land—while its towns could be burned and its homesteads destroyed in every direction, it could not retaliate in kind, and was thus precluded from one most important means of bringing the war to a conclusion, by making the aggressor smart under the miseries which war involves. On the other hand, the Confederates were invulnerable at sea, where they had no interests that could be reached by the enemy. Their ports might be blockaded, their supplies cut off or hindered, but they had no merchant navy to lose. The North, in its turn, was here peculiarly vulnerable. It had the largest mercantile marine in the world, except that of England; it had enormous wealth afloat; and all this wealth lay open to the attacks of the Confederates. By arming privateers, by fitting out cruisers, by building vessels abroad and availing themselves of those they could convert at home, they might hope to spoil the spoiler in his turn, and to retaliate at sea the destruction and spoliation they suffered on land. To this mode of warfare—this method of making the enemy feel that war cannot be waged with impunity, and that the attempt to conquer a gallant and independent nation involves loss and suffering which are not to be lightly encountered — the Confederates early turned their attention. They were at liberty to equip privateers; for the United States, of which they were then a part, had refused to accept that portion of the treaty of Paris which forbade privateering. They were at liberty—as by the law of nations every belligerent has always been—to purchase, build, and fit out cruisers wherever they could, with commissions to sink, take, or destroy every floating thing under the stars and stripes, wherever they might fall in with it. And these lawful means of hostility they prepared to employ with vigour and effect; believing, and not without reason, that the injury they would thus be able to inflict upon their enemy would have no small tendency to render the war unpopular with a large and powerful class in the North, and to remind its frantic advocates, however mildly, what war really means.

In such an enterprise the South had every right to expect the ready sympathy and good wishes of England, or rather—since England, as a Power, had pledged herself to impartiality in the quarrel—of the English people. For no nation has ever carried on this kind of warfare more energetically or more successfully than our own. In every war in which we have been engaged, it has been our peculiar boast and primary object to annihilate the commerce of the enemy, and, by the capture of his ships and cargoes, to make him suffer those inconveniences and injuries of war which we have rarely had the means, and never the desire, to inflict upon him by land. We have always forbidden our armies to adopt the mode of warfare practised by the Yankees and the Prussians; we have never yet permitted the burning of defenceless towns, or the devastation of an unprotected country, or—save where a town has been taken by assault—the maltreatment of non-combatants; but at sea we have stretched the rights of belligerents to the uttermost, and our principal means of offence has been that which the Confederates were preparing to use against the Yankees; that of chasing, capturing, and destroying, or appropriating the ships of hostile countries, and annihilating their commerce. This has been the chief use of our naval supremacy; it has been the principal employment of our seamen; it has been to obtain the power of destroying our enemy's commerce and protecting our own that we have fought and won great battles at sea; it has been in the execution of this purpose that we have employed that enormous number of minor vessels which could not take their place in the line of battle. The business of our frigates, brigs, and corvettes was always that which the Alabama and her consorts have so diligently pursued; and many of our most distinguished captains acquired fame and fortune by the diligence with which, like Captain SEMMES, they harassed and destroyed what MR. ADAMS plaintively and naïvely calls the 'peaceable and innocent' commerce of the enemy. In this manner we avenged upon France the plunder of Prussia and of Spain; and in this way we might well have rejoiced to see the cruisers of the South avenge the devastation of Virginia, the plunder of Louisiana, the inundation of Mississippi, and the conflagration of Jackson.

Our government, however, appears to have thought otherwise. The QUEEN'S proclamation excluded from our ports the prizes of both belligerents. The French Government followed, as by preconcerted arrangement it has done throughout, the policy of England; and the minor Powers, whether of Europe or America, had no choice but to acquiesce in that policy, and accept the example set for their guidance. At the same time, the Federal Government instituted a blockade of the Southern ports, which speedily became efficient enough to render it too hazardous to send in sailing prizes for adjudication. It became, therefore, impossible for the Confederates to sell any prizes they might take; and this at once dismissed to their ports all the privateers that had hoisted the Southern flag. These, depending upon the profits to be made by their cruisers, could no longer keep the sea when the power of turning their prizes to account was taken from them. The cruisers persevered in their duty; but they were deprived of their reward. 'A staggering blow was dealt to the Confederacy,' and a protection of infinite value given to the Federal commerce. This might be consistent with neutrality; for neutrality does not, as Captain SEMMES thinks, involve impartiality. But it is difficult to see how it can be considered consistent with that perfect impartiality which England had professed. We were under no obligation to exclude prizes from our ports. The natural course of neutrality would have been to take no action whatever; and in that case the ships and prizes of both parties would, with their prizes, enter our ports with pleasure. To take action of a kind so manifestly favourable to the Federals, without the excuse that in other respects we had given a countervailing advantage to their enemy—for our interpretation of neutrality, wherever an option was open to us, has been in each case favourable to the North—does not appear to be consistent with fairness or impartiality.

It may, perhaps, be admitted, that good-will towards the North was not the motive of this regulation. But it does not follow therefore that there was no conscious and intentional departure from impartiality involved. The avowed reason of the step, as alleged by the Government, is the interest of peace: that is, it was thought that the admission of the prizes of both parties to our ports would be likely to entangle us in a quarrel. But how? Clearly because it was believed that the Federal Government, being the stronger of the two belligerents, would consider that this admission—this simple abstinence from action on our part—did not tend to promote its interest, and would therefore bully us, and perhaps quarrel with us, if we adopted such a course. We took, therefore, the alternative favourable to the stronger Power, not because we wished well to that Power, but because we thought it expedient to favour it lest it should quarrel with us. A neutral who acts on this principle certainly cannot pretend to be impartial. It is true that he does not favour the stronger belligerent willingly; but he does so consciously and of malice aforethought, and therefore dishonestly. Whether we are guilty of injustice through fear or through favour matters little, except that the former motive is the meaner and more unworthy of the two. It is clear that, as a great Power, we are bound to disregard menaces; and that we are just as culpable in departing from the strict line of impartiality in obedience to threats, as if we did so voluntarily in the hope of advantage or under the influence of sympathy. It is but too evident that the whole of our neutrality during the war has been of this type. The South could not bully us, and the North could; therefore, to avoid being bullied, we have decided every open question—every case in which the law of nations would allow us without flagrant scandal to yield to pressure—in favour of the stronger Power. Our 'warm and friendly' neutrality has been the result of this, but it has not on that account been of the less benefit to the North, or given the South the less cause to complain of us.

As Captain SEMMES very justly remarks, it is this conduct of ours that compelled him to burn his prizes. He had no wish to do so. He would much rather have taken them into Confederate ports, if he could have done so without subjecting them to something very like a certainty of recapture. He would much rather have lodged them in neutral ports until their case could be adjudicated upon by a Confederate Prize Court, according to a well-known though exceptional rule of international law. It would have been much more in accordance with his interest to release them on ransom bond, as he did with all ships containing cargoes that seemed to belong to neutral owners. But his duty to his country required him to cripple and injure the enemy's commerce by every means — that is, by every lawful means — in his power. He could not take his prizes into port, excluded by the blockade from Southern ports and by our regulations from all others. To release them on ransom is to make a loan of valuable property to the enemy, and to diminish the terror which has done so much to paralyse his mercantile marine; and, therefore, though conducive to the captor's interest, it is inconsistent with his duty. To burn the enemy's vessel is confessedly lawful; we have often done it ourselves, and so have other nations; and, as it is the only effectual manner of destroying their utility to their owner, which is open to Captain SEMMES, he was bound by his professional duty to adopt it. Those who revile him for doing so show either that they are totally ignorant of international law or that they are totally indifferent to truth: and those who argue that, because he cannot bring the enemy's vessels into port, therefore he should permit the commerce of a hostile nation to go on unmolested, exact of him a forbearance which we never showed to an enemy, which no naval Power ever has shown or is likely to show; and which, according to every law of maritime warfare, and to the code of every navy in the world, would subject him to share the fate of Admiral BYNG. A naval officer who should omit, from scruples of conscience or humanity, to destroy the commerce of an enemy by taking where he can take, and sinking and destroying where he cannot, would be guilty of a neglect of duty for which every nation exacts the extreme penalty; and there is no service in which more surely than in that of England such an officer would be shot 'pour encourager les autres.'

The Confederate Navy.

AT the present moment, when much attention is directed to the naval operations of the American belligerents, it may be interesting to glance at the work done by the Confederate Navy.

The Atlantic sea-coast of the Federal States of America, without measuring indentations, is about eight hundred miles in extent, with two or three navigable rivers. The coast line of the Confederate States on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, from Chesapeake Bay to the Rio Grande, extends two thousand five hundred miles, receiving more than twenty navigable rivers, including the great father of waters, the Mississippi, which, with its branches within the boundaries of the Confederate States, has five or six thousand miles of river navigation. This vast extent of sea-coast is lined with great sheltered bays. There is no lack of noble harbours, and the deepening of a few inlets would open others which would shelter all the navies of the world.

In ship-building materials, no country is richer than the Confederate States. Forests of live oak in Florida and around the Gulf of Mexico furnish the best of timber; the piny regions of Carolina and Alabama abound in naval stores; hemp is a Southern staple; and the coal, iron, and copper mines of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, yield all other materials. Nine of the Confederate States border on the sea. Two of them have a sea-coast of more than a thousand miles in extent, and there is no one in which could not be built, launched, and sent to sea a line-of-battle ship. There was, a few years ago, a navy yard at Memphis, Tennessee, and large ships are built on the Ohio, and might be on the Missouri, more than a thousand miles from the Gulf of Mexico.

When the Confederate States separated from those which still adhere to the Washington Government, they necessarily carried with them the forts and arsenals within their territories, which their money had built, and which, in some instances, had belonged to the States before the Federal Union was formed. The Federal Government never had any power, under the Constitution, to occupy a single foot of land in any State for military purposes, unless expressly ceded by the legislature of the State for that purpose; and when the Union was dissolved, all military establishments of necessity reverted to the States in which they were situated, and for whose protection they were made. It happened, however, that most of the navy yards of the country were in the Northern States. The North had become the traders, the carriers, and the manufacturers of the South, while the South produced the cotton, sugar, hemp, rice, and tobacco, the great staples of commerce. There were navy yards at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, while the only considerable one in the whole South was at Gosport, near Norfolk, in Virginia, which was destroyed by the Federal authorities, with several of the finest vessels in the navy, in the spring of 1861, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the Confederates. Aside from these, the ships of the Federal navy, the property of all the States, were either in Northern harbours, or, if away on distant stations, were ordered to Northern ports. Naval officers of Southern birth, as a rule, and with very few exceptions, resigned their commissions, as did the Southern officers of the army, when the States of which they were citizens, and to which they owed allegiance, withdrew the powers they had conferred upon the Federal Government. But the officers of the army and navy were placed in very different positions. It was easy to raise armies. A whole nation rose to defend its rights, liberties, and invaded homes. There was already a small supply of arms: few men in the South were without rifles and shot-guns. It was not long before they took great quantities of rifles, artillery, and munitions from those who came to conquer them. The army officers, educated at the Westpoint Military Academy, to which every State sent its quota of cadets, found abundant employment for all their science, skill, and valour. They organised armies, established foundries, manufactories of arms, gunpowder, &c., on a scale of immense magnitude.

But it is not so easy to improvise a navy. The scuttled and half-burnt Merrimac was raised, converted into an ironclad ram, and carried terror and destruction into the Federal fleet in Hampton Roads. But when she had done her work, and was destroyed in doing it, it became necessary to build a navy. A few years ago this would have been comparatively easy work. Before the days of steam and ironclads, when wooden walls and hearts of oak were all that was needed, the keels of a hundred ships would have been laid on the banks of Southern rivers. But in this age of iron and steam everything had to be created by a nation struggling for its life and defending its territories against invading armies. Yet this work has been done. The iron and coal have been dug from the mines. Furnaces, foundries, rolling mills, machine-shops have been established; village blacksmiths, whose highest achievements had been to upset an axe or shoe a horse, have constructed steam-engines and the machinery necessary to produce them. Men who sharpened ploughs have built rams like the Roanoke. There are now powerful and efficient Confederate ironclads, built by Confederate artisans with Confederate materials, at Shreveport, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, and on the rivers of North Carolina and Virginia, forming the nucleus of a compact and powerful navy.

Necessity, here as elsewhere, has been the mother of invention, and the exigencies of defensive warfare have led to the contrivance of submarine batteries of the most skilful construction and tremendous power. The harbour channels, inlets, and rivers of the Confederate States are planted with torpedoes, ready to hurl the strongest ironclad to instant destruction. They have blown up Federal gunboats on the Red River and the St. John's in Florida. They are ready for the monitors in Charleston harbour and in the James River below Richmond. The torpedo corps of the Confederate navy is doing active and excellent service in making its internal waters a terror to the invader. The construction of torpedo boats, or rams, has also passed beyond the range of mere experiment. Confederate officers have demonstrated that the smallest steamer that can keep the sea—and the smaller the better, perhaps, for this service—armed with a torpedo at the end of a long spear, like the nose of a swordfish, can instantly demolish, 'sink and destroy,' the most powerful ship that floats. A charge of gunpowder placed under a ship and exploded can produce but one effect, to make a hole in her bottom, whatsoever its thickness. The explosion was premature in the case of the Minnesota, but it is said to have rendered her useless. Better placed, it would have sunk her beyond all question.

The Federal union of the North and South had the effect to divorce the elements of wealth and power, especially upon the sea. Henceforth those who produce the wealth of the Confederate States will hold also the sword that guards it. The ports of the South will, no doubt, be free to the commerce of the world, but the Confederate States must have a navy in some proportion to its magnificent sweep of gulf and ocean coast. New England, New York, and New Jersey, of all the Northern States, are the only ones that border on the Atlantic. The natural outlets of the great west are the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi. A few miles of ship canal in Canada, connecting Lake Huron with Lake Ontario, will open the whole produce of the great region of the upper lakes to the commerce of Europe; and cargoes of wheat and maize will come from Chicago and Milwaukie to Liverpool and London without transhipment. How long the great west will pay tribute to New York and Boston, how long it will consent to be taxed to pay the interest of the debt now being piled up against it at Washington, when the true avenues of its commerce flow past Quebec and New Orleans, time will show; but if we know anything of American character, and especially of the character of the people of the North-western States, their term of submission to be plundered by the financiers, traders, manufacturers, and politicians of New York and New England will be short. The birth of an independent Confederation on the Pacific is, indeed, only a question of time. It will take place on the day when it is for the interest of the people of those distant States and territories to cut loose from the political mismanagement and overwhelming indebtedness of the Federal Government on the Potomac. San Francisco will be the New York of the Pacific, and will not long pay its golden tribute to the Atlantic States.

It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that the Confederate States should have a powerful navy; and that it will have one, we may conclude from what it has effected under the most trying and difficult circumstances.

'SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE' AT ASHTON.

A PUBLIC MEETING was held on Tuesday night at the Town Hall, Ashton-under-Lyne, to consider the propriety of memorialising the Government in favour of the recognition of the Southern Confederacy. Several of the leading constituents of the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade took a prominent part in the proceedings, and the body of the Hall was well filled by the operatives of the town.

Dr. Lees (the Mayor of the Manor), a gentleman well known as a warm and eloquent advocate of the Southern cause, was voted to the chair. In his opening observations, he paid a high tribute to the military and civil qualities displayed by the Confederacy in perhaps the hardest and certainly most patriotic struggles for national independence witnessed in modern times. The crisis, he said, at which American affairs had now arrived was such as to justify the people of this country in expressing a decided opinion upon the subject. The present attack upon Richmond by General Grant was the fourth or fifth that had been made during four years of desperate warfare, and if it should fail—and he believed it had utterly failed already—the time would then come when European Governments should mediate between the combatants.

Dr. Vernon then moved a formal resolution affirming the propriety of all important constituencies memorialising the Government to acknowledge the independence of the South.

Mr. C. Brooke seconded the resolution, which was carried almost unanimously, and with every mark of the warmest approval.

The following resolution was then moved by the Rev. F. H. Williams:—'That in the opinion of this meeting the Southern States have justly won their right to a Government of their own choice: and that the timely recognition of such right by the Government of England, followed as it probably would be by other European governments, would, under the present circumstances, tend to hasten the conclusion of the unjust and cruel warfare which is being waged by the Federal against the Confederate Government; and this meeting accordingly respectfully submits to Her Majesty's ministers the propriety of taking such steps to that end as they may think prudent in concert with other European Powers.'—He also moved that if the resolution was carried, it should be forwarded to Mr. Lindsay, M.P., in order to strengthen his position when he brought forward his promised resolution on this subject in the House of Commons.

The Rev. gentleman spoke very briefly, but with considerable effect, in admiration of the noble self-sacrifices endured by the heroic people of the South. After nearly four years of strife, during which the gallant exploits of the Confederates had won the respect and admiration of the civilised world, it was surely time to recognise so compact and powerful a government as that of the Southern States. Their cause, that of liberty and independence, was the noblest one in the maintenance of which any nation could throw away the scabbard; and moreover in this instance it was a cause that had been illustrated by leaders whose names would hereafter shine among the brightest in history. He had only to mention General Lee, Stonewall Jackson, General Stuart, Beauregard, the gallant and wounded Longstreet, and last, not least, Captain Semmes, the darling of their young navy. These were names that went to the hearts of Englishmen, and were associated with deeds that challenged the admiration of mankind. The professed neutrality which this country, has pursued was as Mr. Bright described, a 'friendly neutrality,' but unfortunately it was on one side; and it was but an illustration of that neutrality which this country witnessed the other day when the Kearsage sunk the Alabama with shells manufactured in Birmingham, and cannon forged in the arsenals of England. If the recognition was granted, it would be followed by a renewed prosperity to the people of Ashton, and by an extension of free trade principles to the Southern States.

Mr. E. Hemingway seconded the resolution, which was carried with enthusiastic cheers.

Upon the motion of Mr. G. Mellor, seconded by the Rev. R. V. M'Donogh, a vote of thanks was passed to the Mayor of the Manor, and the proceedings were brought to a close.

THERE will be jubilation in the North when the news arrives that Semmes's flag floats no longer. Impartial observers see no reason for such rejoicing. As on land, so on sea, the gallantry, the daring, of the weaker party—strengthened by the belief that right is on their side—suffice to keep their arrogant invaders at bay. We suspect that the Federals have not heard the last of Captain Semmes.—The Realm.

MUTINY AMONGST FEDERAL SAILORS.—The New York Daily News of June 6 says: 'A mutiny came near taking place among the 220 Federal sailors recently sent out for Government ships to Aspinwall. Three or four were killed before the disturbance could be ended.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

New York, June 7, 1864.

LIBERAL MISREPRESENTATIONS—THE SITUATION IN VIRGINIA—SUPERSEDING OF THE NEW ORLEANS TREATY—THE CONDITIONS ON WHICH GENERAL BANKS WILL SANCTION THE REISSUE OF THE PAPER—RESISTANCE TO MR. LINCOLN IN THE NORTH—THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN—MUTINIES IN THE NORTH—THE GRAND MELTING—AN ATTEMPT TO REVIVE THE WAR SPIRIT.

By the log bearings with which the news by the China, which has arrived at Halifax, was announced in the city papers this morning, one would have inferred that there was something like a panic in England among the friends of the South at the receipt of the first news of the battles in Virginia. But the text does not sustain the headings, although it is certain that more importance was attached to the boasting despatches of the Federals than they deserved. It is scarcely to be wondered at, when some of the staunchest friends of the South have been staggered for the moment by the universal strain of gloating despatches which was forced upon the public under the sanction of the Government, from its generals and through the War Department, that an impression should have been made at a distance, where readers are accustomed to give credit for truthfulness in the main, even after allowing for enthusiasm and excitement, to written statements of commanders in the field and ministers of state. Looking back here at the long series of misrepresentations and fabrications, suppressions and falsehoods, with which the earlier events of the war were coloured to the popular tastes by generals and secretaries, one is ashamed that the previous experiences of the utter disregard of truth which pervades the official documents of this Government had not been sufficient warning to discredit everything they say to their own advantage, until corroborated by other testimony. You have learned in England before this how little the costly and bloody struggles of General Grant have really advanced him towards the capture of Richmond. There is one test of the reality of the Federal confidence in the triumphs they boast of, which you may study in the state of the Federal currency, for the improvement of which the Secretary of the Treasury has officially announced that, above all things, military success is indispensable. When General Grant marched into Virginia, the price of gold in relation to currency was 172 to 100—that is, the Government dollar was worth 58 cents. Now that General Grant has got so far as to be, according to the Federal bulletins of victory, within sight of Richmond, and ready to enter, paper is to gold as 194 to 100: in other terms, the Government dollar is worth only 51½ cents. The whole of this depreciation may not be owing simply to military failure, but is due in part to the accelerating effects of the general disorder of the finances. Nevertheless, nothing has been done to check the fall, and the credit of the Treasury is such as it would have been in ordinary times after a severe defeat.

I shall not attempt to describe the military movements which have placed the two armies where they are. The situation is not an encouraging one to the Federal hopes of victory. It is not a creditable one to the military mind which has presided over the operations. The Federal army has now been a month in Virginia, and, after enormous losses, is brought to a position on the same line of advance which was pursued by M'Clellan two years ago, but not so far advanced. It has lost at least fifty thousand men. The frightful list is sometimes placed much higher—it cannot possibly be less—and after a month there is all the work which M'Clellan attempted to do to be again essayed; while the Confederates have strengthened themselves one hundred per cent. over the defences they had then, and M'Clellan had reached this point without the loss of a company. Grant has reached the confines of Richmond with his army, but the most hopeful of his admirers begin to caution the public not to expect its occupation except after months of siege: and those who are not very sanguine are doubting whether he will take it at all.

From Georgia we have only the repetition of bulletins declaring that all goes well with the Union army, who are going to occupy Atlanta very shortly. It was promised to be done last Sunday, but was not; and the confident assurances from the Confederate side show that they have no fears for the issue.

In the Department of the Gulf, General Banks, who, although superseded in military functions, retains a sort of sub-military governorship, has been playing some high pranks. You have read the account of the suppression of the Journal of Commerce and the World of this city by the military power, for the accidental and innocent publication of the spurious proclamation, of which the forgery was traced to a speculating partisan of the Administration. The same proclamation was sent in the way of news regularly to New Orleans, viâ Cairo, in an Administrative paper, and although notice was sent by the steamers as well as by the way of Cairo that it was spurious, it arrived before the contradiction, and was issued in an extra, in undoubted good faith, from the office of the Picayune. General Banks ordered the suppression of the paper at once, but, although convinced of the entire good faith of the publication, has refused to release the paper or allow it to be reissued, except upon conditions which have nothing to do with the imputed offence, from which the paper is cleared. He will allow it to be published on the condition that it becomes an unconditional Union paper, and supports the whole policy of the war as conducted by the President and administered in Louisiana, including abolition of slavery, arming of negroes, reconstruction on the President's plan, and all the other measures which are fiercely contested even in the loyal States as the unconstitutional expedients of a personal party of which Mr. Lincoln is the head. The condition has not been accepted. I do not believe it will be. This tyranny over men's consciences, and spoliation of men's property, by military dictation, at the mere will of an aspiring executive, is one of the traits of character which mark for avoidance the example of this republic, which is fighting for empire by trampling on liberty.

But while these things are going on, without remedy and almost without remark, in the satrapies of the occupied districts of the South, where military caprice reigns supreme, here in the 'loyal' States, where there are courts and State functionaries jealous of military usurpation by Federal authority over the civil rights of citizens, there is a spirit of resistance roused against these violent acts, which attacks the Administration by political means, in the presenting of these outrages on the rights of property, of individual liberty, and of the press, as grounds for asking the overthrow at the polls of the men who execute and the party which tolerates them, and by a direct appeal to the State tribunals to rectify the injury and punish the wrongdoers, by whomsoever authorised or patronised. The Cleveland Convention of Republicans have made opposition to these acts one of the grounds of the resistance to the reelection of Mr.

Lincoln; and all other parties and fragments of parties, except his more personal adherents, are preparing to make the same issue. In this State the courts will be appealed to at the coming term to sustain the State law and the rights and liberties of the citizen of the State, violated by the arbitrary acts of the President towards the Journal of Commerce and the World newspapers and their proprietors. Unhappily, the New Orleans journal, which has suffered equally innocently, precisely in the same way and for the same cause, is left without a resource for redress but the mercy of the commanding general, who only tenders it on dishonouring and impossible terms.

This is the day for the meeting of the Presidential Convention at Baltimore. The main business of the Convention is to nominate Mr. Lincoln for re-election. It has been so thoroughly prepared with that view, that it is not likely that the name of any other candidate will be presented. The official influence of the Administration in its power of patronage and its military control is so enormous, and has been so openly and unscrupulously used for securing the renomination of the President through the agency of party, that his opponents within the party have already abandoned the contest there, and are reduced to the dilemma of coming into his support or breaking off from the party. A large portion of them avowed their purpose long ago not to support Mr. Lincoln under any circumstances, and not to go into any party combination or arrangements which would create an obligation to support him. These men went to Cleveland in mass convention, and, one week ago, nominated General John C. Fremont for President, and John Cochrane for Vice-President, as candidates of a new party which they entitle the 'Radical Democracy.' Another portion of the Republican malcontents remained, and professedly adhere to the Convention, with the intent to defeat Mr. Lincoln there, if possible, and the hope that a new aspect of public affairs and the fresh complications brought about by new events, and a sudden popularity of new men, might break the Convention arrangements of Mr. Lincoln, and enable them to supplant him with another candidate.

A postponement of the nomination is still the object of desire among the adversaries of Mr. Lincoln who desire to maintain the party organisation and get rid of the man; and immense efforts have, within a few days, been directed to that end. A private consultation and a large preliminary convention—the last of the special friends of Secretary Chase—have been labouring night and day to combine influence enough in the Convention to obtain an adjournment for some months without making nominations. The terms of the acceptance by General Fremont of the nomination at Cleveland leave this question open to an arrangement by which only one Republican candidate will be presented; but the conditions are so hard as to be clearly inadmissible. The Convention make the non-eligibility of any President for reelection a cardinal item of their creed, and their candidate points it by declaring in their name that Mr. Lincoln must be set aside as the first condition for reunion. The second is still harder upon his Administration, for it demands that its management should be censured, its general principles denounced, and many of its chief measures arraigned as criminal infringements of the Constitution and the laws and dangerous to public liberty. In brief words, the Chicago Radicals under the lead of Fremont require, as the condition of their support to a Republican ticket, that it shall renounce and denounce Mr. Lincoln and his Administration; otherwise, as General Fremont announces, 'there will remain no alternative but to organise against him every element of conscientious opposition with a view to prevent the misfortune of his reelection.'

The key-word of the Fremont appeal to the popular passion against Lincoln is in this pointed sentence: 'While we are saturating Southern soil with the best blood of the country in the name of liberty, we have nearly parted with our own.'

There is a hearty ring in the demand of these Radicals for a protest against the arbitrary and usurping course of the President, whose election they refuse to support; but it is a sad example of human inconsistency, that with these lofty sounds there are mingled shrieks of rage against the Southern people for their national resistance against the same despotic rule concentrated in a selfish Northern majority; and that, while wrestling for their own freedom, they are clamouring against their own oppressors in that they are lax in the work of enslaving and despoiling the South.

It is not within the range of possibility that the President, with the power in his hands of obtaining from a national Convention an endorsement of his public acts and character, and a leadership which will demand for him the concentrated support of mighty party organisations in every State in the Union, will cower before this demonstration, and consent to be branded with disgrace and dismissed with contempt. Hence it is all but certain that the Convention called in Mr. Lincoln's interest will not consent to weaken his position by deferring action, or make any concessions to purchase such support which include the abandonment of Mr. Lincoln or any censure on his acts. They may court doubtful support by leaving open questions to be debated in the canvass as instructions for the future policy of Mr. Lincoln after he shall have been nominated and elected; but they must go forward with him, and I think they will do it stubbornly. We shall know the result before the next steamer reaches you, and be in a better position to form a judgment on the course which the canvass is likely to take in the contingency, which has not been heretofore considered as probable, of the having of two Republican war candidates.

Among the incidents showing the drift of the undercurrent of popular feeling in regard to the war, the late proceedings in this city, in anticipation of another draft for 300,000 men which is expected, ought not to be omitted. The city has just completed, after extraordinary effort and at great expense, its quota to the two recent calls of the President for 500,000 men and for 200,000 men. To avoid the necessity of drafting, the city expended, as reported by the committee on that subject to the City Councils, the sum of about £6,500,000. In another call for 300,000, the city's proportion would be 11,000 more, at a probable cost of £3,500,000 in bounties, to be furnished by the city. The committee says: 'It is very much to be doubted, judging by past experience, whether we could obtain that sum readily even on the credit of the county of New York, considering the very heavy debt already imposed upon us in the business of raising volunteers.' They therefore advise the abandonment of the attempt to fill the new quota by volunteering, 'both from the paucity of the men willing to enlist and the lack of money to pay those who are willing.'

If this rule be accepted, the only resource is in the extreme rigour of the draft when it comes, and there are official notifications that it may be expected by the 1st of July. To make it more absolute, the Provost-Marshal has given notice that the payment of the exemption fee, by which so many escaped service under the former drafts, and the Treasury got sundry millions of dollars instead of many thousands of men, only protects under the particular call for which the drafting is ordered. Under a new call for troops, the exemption must be renewed by the payment of another £300; and a project is before Congress to repeal even this privilege in the future, and compel every man who is drafted to serve in person, or furnish an approved substitute at his own cost—with this further liability, that if the substitute accepted should be himself drafted on a subsequent call, the person whose place he took must serve in his place or find another substitute; and so toties quoties. There is a dreary looking forward to this harsh process, and a fearful apprehension among the working men, who have been of late showing so much repugnance to fighting even under the stimulus of extravagant bounties by which the needy and the greedy have been tempted into the slaughter-pits of Virginia.

The same exhaustion of men is felt all over the West. So many of the active working population have been drawn off to the war, that there is a dearth of labour to do farm work, which will be felt in the large falling off of crops. In many places women and children have been sent into the fields to do imperfectly what men only have heretofore done. A new draft will give another wrenching turn to the screw by which the Northern people are learning very late what sort of a task it is to undertake to enslave a nation of eight millions armed in defence of their independence, their homes, and their lives.

You will see that this call for 300,000 more, for supplying which the Secretary of War has directed preparations to be made, is the third call since January 1, and the aggregate number of troops demanded is 1,000,000 men, in addition to the 85,000 men tendered by the western governors, and the State militia summoned in the middle States to garrison the border parts that the soldiers which held them might be sent forward into action. This huge demand for armies, such as have never been gathered together within such a space of time, in addition to the large forces already in service, came just after the universal felicitations between the Government, the generals, and the press, upon the utter collapse of the Confederacy and the demoralisation of its armies. But it still lives; and the mighty North groans audibly and savagely under the racking and exhausting struggles yet to be made before it hopes that this obstinate resistance will be beaten down, and begins fearfully to count how many weeks and months there are between itself and ruin if it do not in this last gigantic effort put a speedy end to the war.

There was held on Saturday evening in Union Square in this city what figures in the newspapers as a 'monster mass meeting' in honour of General Grant, but which, when the proceedings are carefully read, exhibits itself simply as a device to revive the flagging war spirit of the people, and help to make the coming draft more endurable. The resolutions are highly laudatory of General Grant and General Sherman; and, congratulating the country that it has got rid of civilian generals, from whom nothing but disaster has been reaped, and that its armies are now under the direction of men of military education, and hence inferring, with unusual modesty of expression, that 'at no period since the beginning of hostilities has the prospect been so favourable as at present for a speedy and successful close of the war,' conclude with the following appeal for more help:—

'But, to insure that end, it is necessary that our army should be efficiently and rapidly reinforced; that every effort should be made to stimulate enlistments, and that the young men of the country who have the requisite vigour and nerve should come forward and share in the honours which will follow them through life, of having fought in the ranks of that noble army by whose courage and patriotism the republic was saved.'

Thus, while the War Department is issuing boasting bulletins which lead the people to believe that Grant with his victorious army is thundering about Richmond, and ready to enter and disperse the Confederate Government, and annihilate its armies, and occupy the conquered country, it is sending forth imploring appeals to the reluctant populace for more men, and talks through its orators of what is to be accomplished when these new armies come.

Note, as you read this, that the twenty millions of the North have been, for now more than three years, pouring army after army, in hundreds of thousands and half millions of men, upon the territory of the South, until the whole stock of willing soldiers is exhausted, even when swelled by legions of mercenaries hired from abroad, and helped in the work of subjugation by a hundred thousand negroes whom they have enticed into revolt, and armed against their masters; and measure, if you can, the audacity with which these renewed bloody struggles to enslave a unanimous people are called for in the name of liberty and republicanism. And the nation which thus propagates empire with fire and sword incessantly vaunts itself, in the language of the resolutions in Union Square on Saturday evening, to be the 'freest and most liberal on earth.'

But with all these appeals, backed by letters from the President and Secretary of the Treasury urging the imminency of the crisis of the war, and aided by the popularity of General Grant, which for the moment is high, because the populace has been persuaded that he is at last the man who will put an end to the war, the meeting was a dull one. The numbers were small compared with the rousing meetings which were got up in the early stages of the war, and the speakers laboured heavily to get up a show of enthusiasm among the five or six thousand which came slowly together where fifty thousand used to come rushing and shouting to raise volunteers for the war. The name of Grant and the promise of victory can't get up a sincere, hearty war meeting in New York.

MARYLAND.—The Baltimore correspondent of the Times, under date of May 6, writes:—'Baltimore is as inimical to all that is Yankee as Richmond or Charleston, and were it not for the presence of a large military force, which is in possession of Fort M'Henry, and could reduce the city to ashes in an hour, if it threatened to revolt against the despotism which it abhors, it would hoist the Confederate flag, and invite the Southern army to enter and hold it. Maryland, of which it is the pride and the emporium, has at this moment no less than 20,000 of her sons in the Southern army, fighting, without the inducement of bounty money or any mercenary consideration whatever, for the cause of Southern independence; about double the number that she has raised for the Northern armies, notwithstanding all the bounties offered by the Federal Government and the municipalities, and the sums contributed by the rich to avoid the risks of a conscription. The 20,000 are for the most part natives of Maryland; the 8,000 or 10,000 in the Federal armies are mainly Irish or Germans, with whom the bounty is everything and the cause nothing; together with negroes and the freed slaves of "disloyal" owners.'

GRANT'S LOSSES.

(From the Petersburg Express, May 30.)

LATE and trustworthy information has reached Petersburg from the enemy's line. It is of the most encouraging character. Outside of Grant's official circle, and safely removed from the tyranny of Lincoln and Seward, the Northern people do not hesitate to admit terrible losses in Grant's army. None estimate it at less than 75,000, and many say that it will reach 90,000. This is from all causes—killed, wounded, prisoners, stragglers, and deserters.

The desertion and straggling is without precedent. A letter was received in this city on Saturday from Moseby's command, well and favourably known in Petersburg. This writer states that he and his command, with their daring chief, have been in the rear of Grant since he moved from Culpeper House. He states that from the Rapidan and the Rappahannock to the Potomac the country literally swarms with stragglers. These men do not hesitate to say that they are from the army of the Potomac, and under no circumstances will they be carried back alive. Each man is armed, and says he will sell his life as dearly as possible before he will be taken.

The Northern people say that Grant has lost four times as many men as any general who ever commanded the army of the Potomac. It has been ascertained by actual count that he lost more men on the 12th in the terrible contest of Spottsylvania Court House, than Napoleon Bonaparte lost on the memorable field of Waterloo. The people say that the worst feature of the present melancholy condition of affairs is that the places of the recently slain and maimed cannot be supplied. Every garrison and outpost has been swept clean to replenish Grant's decimated ranks; and it is asserted as an absolute fact that there were not men enough at Fortress Monroe last Friday to garrison the place.

It is also represented that Grant's present army is greatly demoralised. The three years' men are very much discontented at the bad faith in which the Lincoln Government has acted towards them; and the new-comers, or veteran reinforcements, as Stanton telegraphs to Dix, cannot be made to face General Lee's gallant grey-backs. Four times during the past eight days did Grant attempt to bring on another such fight as he engaged in at Spottsylvania Court House, but each time the men refused to be led to the slaughter.

LETTER FROM A FEDERAL GENERAL.—The Washington Correspondent of the New York Daily News on June 5 says he was permitted to read a private letter from a General of high rank in the Army of the Potomac, which contained the following passage:—'We have now been fighting three consecutive weeks—all the time looking to the objective point of Richmond. In all the battles and strategic movements I think the utmost military skill has been displayed by the Commanding General. One thing is certain beyond peradventure, that General Grant is a military genius. In all his movements thus far, he has used, punctually, his own ideas and plans in attacking or countering the blows of the enemy; and although he has been several miles from the scene of the great conflicts, he has so familiarised himself with the topography of the country, the strength and location of the enemy, and the probabilities of their point of attack, that he has never failed to meet them man for man, and generally with successful results. But I must confess, after all this fighting and loss of life, it is natural enough to enquire what have we gained? Without wishing to criticise my superiors or set my poor judgment against theirs, I can only say simply that we have gained nothing. After two and a half years of marching and countermarching with this army, I now find myself on the same ground that I was on with M'Clellan two years ago, with this exception, that the enemy have improved every point fifty per cent. These are plain facts, as time alone will tell. I am in for the war, however, and shall do my duty, God being my helper, to carry out every order of my superiors. If I fall, I could not wish to die in a nobler cause—that of my country.'

A NORTHERN VIEW OF THE SITUATION IN VIRGINIA.—The New York World on June 6 published a leader in which the following observations occur:—'General Grant states officially that in the last three days' fight our losses were seven thousand five hundred; but this number, in conjunction with the heavy losses incurred in all the encounters from the Rapidan to the Pamunkey, makes an enormous aggregate. And yet, with all the losses of life and disabling of valuable men, our army is still on the north bank of the Chickahominy, and the rebels are contesting, inch by inch, every spot of ground outside of the immediate fortifications of the rebel capital. If all that is before our army were simply a battle, we could feel tolerably assured of victory; but there is more than a battle. There is a series of bloody engagements, and then a siege under conditions extremely unfavourable to the Union arms. Richmond will not be invested as was Donelson and Vicksburg; it will be besieged from only one side, and what a siege is under those circumstances can be understood by referring to the history of Sevastopol. It would take an army of three hundred thousand men to encompass Richmond, and there is no probability that General Grant will have so large a force at his command. The prospect, therefore, is of a long siege—a siege not merely of months but of many months. A system of earth-work defences, like Todtleben's at Sevastopol, can be used against us, and may prolong this unhappy war indefinitely.'

EUROPEAN NEWS THROUGH YANKEE SPECTACLES.—The New York Herald of June 7 says the news of Grant's 'victories' produced such an effect in England, that 'the pirate Georgia was immediately advertised for private sale, her crew dismissed, and her stores sold at auction.' Also that it induced Earl Russell to purchase the Mersey steam-rams. 'But,' says the Herald, 'had the news been the other way—had Lee defeated Grant—undoubtedly the rams would have been released to prey upon our commerce.'

FRENCH SYMPATHY FOR THE LOSS OF THE ALABAMA.—The Constitutionnel states that the loss of the Alabama has caused great agitation. All the letters from Cherbourg testify to the profound regret prevailing in that town at the event. The Constitutionnel also adds that from one end of France to the other the same feeling obtains.

'It is now generally admitted that Grant's army has met its match, that the line of the Chickahominy cannot be forced, and that Richmond is consequently impregnable from the north side. Important news may even now be travelling towards us from Virginia; but of this we are sure, that the Southern soldier will feel his purpose rather strengthened than weakened when he hears of the fate of the Alabama and the conduct of her gallant crew.'—The Guardian.

Federal Soldiers Returning Home.—The Baltimore correspondent of the Times writes on May 6:—'Opening the window, and looking out upon Monument Square, I find the place full of soldiers. Thinking it was a reinforcement for General Grant, I descended into the square and mixed with the crowd of spectators. I soon learnt that these hardy, sunbrowned, and dirty-looking veterans were the Pennsylvania reserves, who were not rushing to the battle-field to crush the rebellion, but rushing from it because their time had expired. Their numbers were said to be upwards of 4,000, though it afterwards appeared that they were less than 2,000; that they formed the sole remnants of 12 regiments, originally of the full complement of 1,200 men each, or 14,400 in all; that they had enlisted for three years in the first flush of the excitement that followed the Confederate attack on Fort Sumter; that they had fought in all the battles of M'Dowell, M'Clellan, Pope, Burnside, and Hooker; that they had crossed the Rapidan with General Grant, fought under his orders at the Wilderness and Spottsylvania Court House, marched with him in his long and dangerous circuit from Spottsylvania to the Chickahominy, and that, their time having expired some days previously, they had left his army on June 1, and marched two days from the front to the White House, whence they were conveyed in steam-transports to Washington, and thence again by rail to this city, on their way home. Their battered banners, as well as their tattered clothes, bore witness to the work they had performed and the hard service they had undergone; and as they marched through the crowded streets it was impossible not to admit that 20,000 new recruits, even if not composed of Irish and German mercenaries, could not make amends to General Grant for the loss of 2,000 such fine fellows as these, seasoned to war, inured to hardships, and who had, moreover, the additional merit of having enlisted for pure love of the cause, at a time when bounty money was not considered a provocative of heroism.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

Although such a step was not generally anticipated, the Directors of the Bank of England at their weekly meeting on Thursday last reduced the rate of discount from 7 to 6 per cent. Since then the Money Market has been uniformly steady, but the change has had the effect of inducing withdrawals of specie, notwithstanding at present only to a limited extent, for transmission abroad, the Bank of France being in the market as a purchaser of about 500,000*l*. We shall have now the payments for the revenue in full force, and these, with other engagements, will assist to keep the rates for money up to an extreme point. It is, however, scarcely expected, that there will be a fresh advance in the official minimum on the eve of the distribution of the dividend. Cheap money must not be looked for during the remainder of the year—it may be dearer than at present after the September quarter—for it is usually in the autumn months that we find the great and important changes ensue. There has been a 'little pinch' at the Stock Exchange for accommodation, but it has now passed, and the terms for short loans have not exceeded during the last twenty-four hours 5 to 5½ per cent. The great moving power of depression in the markets for securities is the apprehension of a resumption of hostilities between Germany and Denmark. The Conference for the moment is adjourned, but it has not finally separated. Still the issue of negotiations would appear to be very doubtful.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Since the reduction in the rate of discount on Thursday, there has been a material change in the aspect of the bullion market, gold being withdrawn to a considerable extent, the greater portion, it is believed, having been taken for the purpose of carrying out an engagement with the Bank of France, and more for the same destination, is still to be withdrawn. The only parcel sent in during the week amounted to 4,000*l*., whilst the sum taken out has been 181,000*l*. The arrivals of specie have again been considerable, amounting to 452,481*l*., of which 290,767*l*. is from New York, 4,690*l*. from Boston, 20,000*l*. from St. Petersburg, and 137,024*l*. from the Australian Colonies. The Poonah steamer has taken out for the East, 21,793*l*., of which 5,948*l*. was in gold, and the remainder in silver; and the Atrato, 30,300*l*., chiefly in gold for the West Indies. The silver market remains very quiet, and the transactions limited, there being just now but a very slight demand for the East, and quotations remain unchanged. There is likewise but little doing in Mexican dollars, and the nominal price is as previously announced. The gold ships at present known to be on their way from Australia will bring about 244,000*l*.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English Funded Securities has exhibited considerable depression throughout the week, and prices have shown a gradual decline. The unsatisfactory state of political affairs on the Continent, with the probable termination of the Conference without arriving at a favourable result, have been the chief causes of the depression. In the early part of to-day affairs looked exceedingly gloomy: but towards the close of business a rather better tone prevailed, on the report that the Conference to-day had not broken up finally as was anticipated, but had adjourned until Friday. Consols consequently left off a shade firmer, being at 89¾ to ⅞ ex div. for money, and 90 to ⅛ ex div. for the account, which is a decline, as compared with last Wednesday, of ¼ per cent. Exchequer bills are unchanged, the March issues being quoted at 8*s*. to 3*s*. dis., and those of June at 5*s*. dis. to par. There have been some extensive fluctuations in foreign stocks, and generally of an adverse character. Attention has been chiefly directed to Spanish, the passives having further declined 2⅝ per cent., in consequence of the pressure of sales induced chiefly by the continued unsatisfactory conduct of the Spanish Government with regard to their financial proceedings. The fall in the certificates has been only ¼ per cent. Mexican remain heavy at another decline of 1⅛ per cent., and Greek have fallen an additional 1 per cent. The closing prices this evening were: Greek, 23 to 23½; Mexican, 43⅜ to 43⅝; Spanish passives, 29 to 29¼; do. certificates, 9½ to 10; Turkish six per cents. of 1854, 90 to 91, and those of 1862 70¼ to 71.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been inactive all the week, pending any decisive news from America concerning the Virginian campaign; the price, however, in spite of general depression in speculative stock, remains steady, closing 63 to 65.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There has been slightly more animation in the market for American Government and Railway securities; but still the business is far below the average extent. In the early period of the week prices exhibited rather more firmness, but subsequently the accounts from the North caused quotations to become weaker. The business transacted is thus officially reported:—Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvanian section, at 73½; Erie, $100 shares, all paid 53, 53½, 55½, and 54; ditto., 7 per cent, 3rd mortgage, 59¼, and 59; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 34, 35¼, 34½, and 35 dis.; ditto ditto, $100 shares, all paid, 60½, 61, and 60; Philadelphia and Reading, $50 shares, 31.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A rather larger business than usual has been transacted in British railway securities, and prices have fluctuated from day to day, but with the exception of some few instances to only a moderate extent. These variations have been chiefly in sympathy with the other markets, and caused by the changing aspects of foreign politics. The general tenor of the market has been unfavourable, the exceptions being in West Cornwall, which exhibit an improvement of 4 per cent. North-eastern (Berwick) have advanced 1½ per cent. North-eastern (Leeds), and do. (York), each 1 per cent., and Lancashire and Yorkshire ½ per cent. On the other hand, there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Dublin and Belfast junction, London, Chatham and Dover, North British, and North London; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Great Northern, Great Western, London and South-Western, Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire, Metropolitan and South-Eastern. In foreign and colonial undertakings there is also rather more doing, and prices are comparatively steady.

BANK AMALGAMATION.

It has been announced that the private banking firm of Messrs. Currie & Co. of Cornhill, and the private establishment of Messrs. Glyn, Mills, & Co. of Lombard Street have been amalgamated. The arrangement is to take effect from July 1. Mr. Raikes Currie and Mr. B. Currie join the firm of Messrs. Glyn & Co., and the business hitherto carried on in Cornhill will be transferred to Lombard Street.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSION.

The suspension was announced this evening of Messrs. Lawrence and Fry, of Old Broad Street, timber merchants, and who are also extensively engaged as railway contractors. The liabilities are estimated at 250,000*l.*

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At a meeting of the North British Australian Company resolutions were passed confirming the proceedings of a previous meeting, for authorising the increase of the capital of the Company by the creation and issue of 32,565*l.* Six per cent. Guaranteed Stock.—At a meeting of the proprietors of the European Bank an interim dividend of 15*s.* per share, being at the rate of 14 per cent. upon the paid-up capital, was declared. It was stated by the chairman (Mr. C. Colchester), that a further dividend would be declared and a report presented on the 31st August next, and an amount carried to the reserve fund, more than sufficient for liquidation of the preliminary expenses of the company. The whole preliminary expenses of the English and Irish Bank would be liquidated, with which it was amalgamated on the 1st June by the allotment of 16,000 shares, to be paid for by the English Bank, in money, at 2*l.* per share premium. — The Queen's Hotel Company, Upper Norwood, at a general meeting, have declared a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. It was stated that the future prospects of the undertaking are most encouraging. —At an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders of the London and South Western Bank, the special resolution passed at the meeting on May 31, giving the directors power to increase the existing capital to any amount not exceeding 3,000,000*l.*, to increase the maximum number of directors from 14 to 18, and the qualification from 20 to 50 shares, was approved and confirmed. — At the annual general meeting of the South Australian Banking Company, the report of the directors was unanimously adopted, and a dividend of 10 per cent. payable half-yearly was agreed to. It was stated by Mr. Waterhouse, one of the directors in the Colonies, that there was a large and growing trade between South Australia and India, especially in the exportation of copper, of which 200,000*l.* worth were exported last year, and it was probable that in future India would obtain the whole or nearly all its copper from South Australia. The agricultural interest was also flourishing, and much land at present valueless would be eventually brought under cultivation.—At a meeting to-day of the proprietors of the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, a dividend of 14 per cent. for the half-year was declared, making with the previous dividend 18 per cent. per annum.—The South Australian Company have also held their meeting to-day, and declared a dividend of 7 per cent. payable on July 15 and January 15 next.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been been issued of the London and Southwark Insurance Corporation. The capital, proposed to be raised is 500,000*l.* (with power to increase) in 20,000 shares of 25*l.* each. The first issue is to be 10,000 shares only, upon which 50,000*l.* will be called up. The object of the Company is to afford additional facilities for fire and life insurance, of which there is said to be some want on the south side of the Thames. Marine insurance business will also be added at a future period, should the shareholders deem it prudent to take such a step.—A prospectus has been circulated by Messrs. Halcomb & Co., sack contractors (limited), who have formed a company for the purpose of purchasing their business of sack contractors (for supplying sacks on hire), who have for some years past enjoyed such advantages in the working of their trade, as to lead to a demand for hired sacks, amounting in value to a sum beyond ordinary individual means. Messrs. Halcomb & Co. have their principal depôts in London, and one each at Gloucester, Bristol, Worcester, Birmingham, Southampton, Exeter, and Plymouth, together with more than 400 minor depôts, working from these central points. Messrs. Halcomb feel such confidence in the success of the undertaking, that they have agreed to guarantee for five years a minimum dividend of 10 per cent. The proposed capital is 100,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each.—The London Theatre Company (limited) is announced with a capital of 50,000*l.*, in 5,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The object is to erect, on an eligible site near King's Cross, a theatre capable of containing 2,500 people, with a concert-room or bijou theatre attached. It is proposed to construct the building on the most approved principles, and an estimate appended to the prospectus shows a net profit of 9,805*l.* per annum, being at the rate of nearly 20 per cent.—The Credit Foncier and the Credit Mobilier have issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for 300,000 of mortgage debentures at par of the City Officers' Company, bearing interest at 5 per cent., secured as a first charge upon the freehold and leasehold property of the Company. The instalments are 20 per cent. on subscription, and a like amount on August 1, September 1, November 1, and January 1 next.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Business in these departments has been checked by growing apprehensions in reference to continental politics, a meeting of the Conference to-day having been looked forward to with increasing distrust. Traders of all classes have in consequence reduced their operations to the narrowest limits possible, and the markets throughout have shown renewed dullness. The effect of the present political difficulty is the greater, as well as the more general, because it involves not only a danger of war, but also that of a ministerial crisis, at all times a check to activity in these departments of trade. Grain of all kinds is firmly held, but no general advance can be quoted, although the small parcels of English wheat at market have occasionally realised 1*s.* more than was obtainable a week ago. The oilcake trade continues dull owing to the abundance of good pasturage which the season offers. In the provision market foreign butters have sustained an important rise, Friesland advancing as much as 10*s.* per cwt. Of American there is none here. Bacon has realised rather higher prices for the best qualities, but inferior sorts have not sold so well. American short middles, rib in, are held for 40*s.* to 42*s.*, at which the demand is limited. The cheese trade is inactive, but in what is doing steady rates are paid. The sugar market has exhibited increased dullness; and although supplies are not pressed, as the statistical position of the market is considered very sound, yet prices, of the middling qualities at least, are 6*d.* lower on the spot, whilst two floating cargoes of Cuba (Muscovado) were today sold at 30*s.* 3*d.*, which is 1*s.* per cwt. decline. Coffee has not varied materially, but is purchased less freely, and, as usually is the case under the circumstances, prices have a drooping tendency. Tea is not quoted cheaper, but the public auctions have gone without animation, and at very irregular prices, in which buyers have been the principal gainers. The only feature in spices is the firmness in the common qualities of East India ginger, owing to the scarcity of African. Bengal is to-day held at 45*s.* per cwt.; wheat is not, however, very readily paid. Saltpetre keeps very dull from heavy stocks; the commoner kinds are cheaper. In drugs, gums, and drysaltery articles, the variations have been trifling, and the dealings have been upon a limited scale: oils of all kinds are a slow sale. Sperm has been forced off at 70*l.*, and 70*l.* 10*s.* for Colonial. French turpentine, after receding to 68*s.*, closes firmer at 69*s.* per cwt. Metals have participated in the general want of activity, and, except for spelter, which has realised 24*l.*, prices are easier; Scotch pig iron closed to-day at 56*s.* 6*d.* per ton; and a small sale of Straits tin was made at 104*l.* per ton, cash.

Liverpool, Wednesday, June 22.—Business in cotton has been rather more buoyant this week, particularly for American, but the supply has not proved equal to the demand, and prices for all useful descriptions have advanced from ⅛*d.* to ¼*d.* per lb. Egyptian has also been more enquired after at an improvement in value, whilst Surats have been more freely offered at a slight decline. The sales this week, however, have only reached 41,000 bales, of which 13,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time have been 1,179,956 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 999,230 bales. There have been imported so far this year 1,047,886 bales, and to the corresponding period last year 710,556 bales. The exports this year have been 234,698 bales, to the same time last year 210,216 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 790,092 bales, against 532,827 bales in 1863. On speculation this year the quantity taken has been 208,071 bales; last year it was 240,740 bales. The computed stock at the present time is 304,462 bales, and at the same date last year 360,065 bales. The quotations at the close of the market this afternoon were: American descriptions, 28½*d.* to 29½*d.*; Pernambuco, 28¾*d.* to 29½*d.*; Macao, 28¾*d.* to 29*d.*; Bahia, 29*d.*; Egyptian, 28¼*d.* to 31*d.*; Smyrna, 22*d.* to 24*d.*; China, 18¼*d.* to 19¾*d.*; Peruvian, 29*d.* to 30*d.*; and Surats, 13*d.* to 23¾*d.*

Within the last day or two business in the Manchester markets has been greatly interfered with by the unsatisfactory position of the Germano-Danish question, and there is not much probability of any improvement taking place till it is decided whether the result is to be peace or war. In some departments increased depression is caused by the non-arrival of the usual telegraphic despatches from India, which are now some days overdue. For shipping yarns there is a considerable number of orders in the market, but they are held back pending the result of the Conference. There is scarcely anything doing in the way of exportation; prices, however, continue very firm, and very few, if any, of the specimens are inclined to accept any reduction upon last week's rates. There has also been a very quiet business in home yarns, and prices generally are unaltered. The market for cloths remains also in a very quiescent state, the demand being particularly limited, buyers still exhibiting no disposition to operate except for the purpose of filling up stocks. Under these circumstances, manufacturers refrain from pressing sales, they not being disposed to make any reduction in quotations, which, to effect bargains, must be submitted to. The latest prices were:—⅞ grey printers from 8*s.* 2*d.* to 11*s.*, according to weight and quality; ⁹⁄₈ grey Madapollams from 7*s.* 6*d.* to 10*s.*; ⁹⁄₈ grey printers from 11*s.* 4½*d.* to 17*s.* 6*d.*; and ⁵⁄₄ grey shirtings from 12*s.* 9*d.* to 26*s.* 9*d.* Water-twist, No. 20, from 2*s.* 2*d.* to 2*s.* 7½*d.*; No. 30 from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 10½*d.*; and No. 40 from 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 3½*d.* Mule-twist, No. 20, from 1*s.* 10½*d.* to 2*s.* 6¾*d.*; No. 50 from 2*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 2½*d.*; and No. 100 from 3*s.* 6½*d.* to 4*s.* 3½*d.*

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hotze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

ACTS OF THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1863–1864.

AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

WHEREAS, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilization, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States; And whereas, the conditions of the conflict demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, to lawfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence . —

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the export duties of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

SEC. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may impose.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship, boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

SEC. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue and other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure his act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

SEC. 6. That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

SEC. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

APPROVED, February 6, 1864.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT "TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE," APPROVED, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I. AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses or rice, shall, before the landing on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail, a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable dispatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged with a cargo, consisting one-half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel, shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo; or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be five pence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton at ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. If the outward bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds of her cargo for account of the Confederate States, the outward freight shall be six pence sterling per pound, and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, her owners may fill up the same on their own account: but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one-third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate and payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and he shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligations of the said bond so far as the same was practicable, and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law, which declares 'that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations, shall be recoverable in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

13. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately, within a few days.

Treasury Department, C. S. A.
RICHMOND, March 16, 1864.

THE following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved February 6, 1864:

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel; and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo, shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the net proceeds of her outward cargo, and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved, March 16, 1864.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits, or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries,' approved May 21, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:—All things for medical purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castile, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval service.

SEC. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; mofls and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, or of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, buildets, and other portions of carpetings, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cordial and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds; fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other; mats, matting and mats made of flags, palm, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread laclings and insertings; velvets of all kinds

SEC. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges, cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, rough, or uncut, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones, and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery; leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E: Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

SEC. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to articles of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

SEC. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. If any article or articles the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

SEC. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate States after said first day of March next, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and the name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

SEC. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.'

SEC. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;' and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrict ons as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned.'

SEC. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

Approved, February 6, 1864.

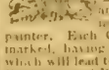
HUBBUCK'S PATENT WHITE ZINC PAINT.



THE most durable and beautiful paint known, is cheaper than White Lead, and is proved to be superior for all purposes than the pernicious Lead Paint, and equally adapted for all climates. Its whiteness is unaffected by bilge water, boiling sugar, or noxious gases. It is free from any poisonous ingredient, and suited in all respects to the use of the painter. Each Cask of Pure White Zinc is Stamped 'HUBBUCK, LONDON PATENT.' Inferior Zinc Paint, so marked, having been sold in Foreign Markets, the Patentees offer a Reward of FIFTY POUNDS for information which will lead to the conviction, in an English or Colonial Court, of those who have pirated their Mark. Both Exporters and Retailers are liable for its sale.

HUBBUCK'S ANTI-CORROSIVE PAINTS

Are very durable, and the most valuable protection to Iron Roofs, Bridges, Piers, Ships, and Buildings, exposed to storms, weather and scorching sun; they soon become extremely hard, and do not blister. They are made of Stone, Slate, Copper, White, Blue, Green, or any other Colour that is desired.

HUBBUCK'S ANTI-OXIDATION COMPOSITION,

For Coating Iron and Wood Ships' Bottoms; a preservative against fouling and corrosion. This Composition is ready for immediate use, and obviates the waste of carrying unmixed Paints, Oils, Driers, &c. It is also applicable to all the purposes of other Paints.

HUBBUCK'S PALE BOILED OIL

Has less colour than Raw Linseed Oil, is a quick, hard, and certain drier for White and Light Coloured Paints.

War Department contracts, 2,670 bales=6,430. On private account, 14,398 bales. Total export, 20,828 bales. Value, 50*l.* to bale: Government, 321,500*l.*; private, 719,900*l.* Total, 1,041,400*l.*

The first glance at this statement, with its long column of captures and losses, will impress the foreign reader forcibly with the apparent efficiency of the Yankee blockade. Where steamer after steamer comes to grief—where Leopard, and Giraffe, and Eagle, and Raccoon, are all successively run down by the Yankees or fall a prey to their vigilance—where Ruby and Pearl and Diamond are seized by them as the conqueror seizes the jewels of an Indian monarch—where Venus perishes on the strand from which she is fabled to have risen, and Vesta is to be mourned like the lost Pleiad, it would seem, indeed, that Confederate commerce was virtually closed up, and all communication with the outer world, on the part of the Confederates, cut off in fact as in theory. But a careful examination of the tables will conclusively establish the exact converse of this hypothesis. While many steamers are beached, sunk, or captured upon their first trip, many others, and the large majority, make several trips before they go to the bad, and others run in and out with such frequency and ease that when at last they sink or burn or are taken by the blockaders, it is upon the principle that the pitcher that goes often to the well must some day or other be broken. It will be observed that, during fifteen and a half months, out of five hundred and ninety attempted trips, four hundred and ninety-eight were successful—in other words, as nearly as possible, of every six vessels that dared the blockade five went through, or that only one-sixth of the Confederate marine has been disturbed, speaking of cargoes and not of bottoms. Now it may be, in Earl Russell's opinion, an efficient blockade which lets five vessels go through and apprehends or destroys the sixth, but it hardly comes up to the requisitions of international law. Yet this blockade must be respected. It is maintained, you know, by the greatest people on earth against a handful of rebels.

Since the above tables were made out, seven steamers, the Lucy, Young Republic, Mars, Minnie, Greyhound, Helen, and Atalanta, have arrived in Wilmington, and one, the Rothsay Castle, has run into Charleston through the ironclad fleet off the harbour of that city.

FACTS VERSUS YANKEE REPORTS—THE BATTLE OF MAY 12—WHY LEE FELL BACK—THE POSITION OF BUTLER—THE FIGHT ON MAY 21—PROMOTION OF GENERAL TAYLOR.

If you had reposed the least confidence in the statements of the New York Herald with regard to the successes of Grant and Butler, in their combined attack upon Richmond, up to the 14th of this month, I am sure you would not have expected to receive a letter from your correspondent dated at the Confederate capital as above. You would have thought that in much less than a week's time Jefferson Davis and his Cabinet would be behind the Pedee, the Confederate Congress dispersed if not hanged, and the cause of Southern independence abandoned. I have seen the Herald of the 14th, and after reading it I am almost tempted to doubt my own existence. The lie is told with such variety of expression, it is so ingeniously insinuated, so mixed up with all the current events of the day, so incorporated in the reflections of the editor, so boldly stated with circumstance in the news column, so iterated and reiterated, that it has quite the effect of truth. One begins to believe that Lee is in disorderly rout, that Beauregard is flying before Butler, that the President must really have run off, and that if you should walk into the Treasury or War Department you would find it empty, and its operations transferred to a more southern latitude. It requires a brigade marching with elastic step to the music of 'Wait for the Waggon'—such a sight I have just witnessed from the window—to dispel the delusion of the Herald from my mind. I do not know what effect the accounts of the Yankee press may have upon the English people, but I suppose that you are too familiar with its boundless mendacity to have accepted the announcements of victory as fact. By this time they have probably learned even in Boston that Butler is not yet in Richmond, that Grant did not win a series of victories eight days together, and that sixty thousand men, killed, wounded, and missing, as against twelve thousand on the Confederate side, which are as nearly as possible the accurate numbers, is a fearful loss wherewith to begin a campaign which is to be vigorously prosecuted all summer.

In the battle of Thursday, the 12th instant, in which the Yankees claim to have achieved so immense a success, on account whereof bells are ringing and guns firing all over the North and West, their loss in dead and disabled men exceeded ours by more than three to one. The attack made by Hancock's division upon Edward Johnson's division at daybreak was vigorous and well-directed, and for a time it seriously threatened to turn our position and carry the day. Some delay in getting artillery into place enabled the Yankees to get possession of our entrenchments, and a scene of great confusion ensued, which, with less disciplined troops than those of General Lee, might have ended in panic. As it was, the enemy captured four thousand prisoners, including Major-General Edward Johnson and Brigadier George H. Stewart, when a new line was formed, and for the rest of the day the Confederates resisted all attempts to break through it, piling the ground with the dead bodies of their assailants. Grant hurled his masses against our centre with the most utter recklessness of human life, and the result was the loss of far the best part of his army. It is quite certain that had General Lee been as callous as Grant, he might have fallen upon the Yankee army and put it to rout, but the end could only have been gained by the destruction of half his forces, and the prudent Confederate leader must now economise his men. General Lee has preferred to wait for Grant's own attacks, and in order to shorten his line of communication with Richmond, always threatened by raiding parties of Federal cavalry, has fallen back as far as Hanover Junction, twenty-five miles from the city. This will of course be taken for a confession of weakness by the Yankees; they will cry out as usual in exultation over the 'last ditch;' they will calculate how much nearer Grant is to Richmond at Hanover Junction than he was at Germanna Mills, and exclaim—'This is the great Grant: tremble, ye rebels, in your capital!' You will remember that the Confederates fell back seventy miles from Yorktown to the Chickahominy, that M'Clellan was for weeks in sight of the steeples and domes of Richmond, and that up to the battle of Seven Pines—which the Yankees, in their ignorance of Southern forest trees, or else through a simple habit of lying, call Fair Oaks—he had suffered no diminution of his army at all comparable to what Grant has lost in a single day; and yet, with all this progress, his next step was to Harrison's Landing. So will it fare with Ulysses. At this moment, the two armies are in line of battle near Hanover Junction, and the conflict may be joined before to-morrow's set of sun. Ulysses, who is thoroughly of opinion that he has whipped General Lee, may commence it without loss of time, and has possibly already sent Stanton his bulletin of triumph. But we do not fear the issue of the struggle, and if he goes the way of M'Clellan, and Hooker, and Burnside, like these mighty leaders he must retire from the command of Lincoln's army, and give up his hopes for the Presidency.

General Butler has relapsed into comparative quietude, and is now shut up in a little neck of land, six miles square or thereabouts, between the James and Appomattox, behind abattis, wire fences, wide ditches, and earthworks, having Monitors and gunboats all around him. Night before last (Saturday, May 21), a moonlight attack was made upon our lines, held principally by the brigade of General Wise, in which the Yankees were easily repulsed with very great loss, our men reserving their fire until the attacking party came within twenty yards of them. The day before (Friday, May 20), a very obstinate engagement was fought at a point two miles east of the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad, the enemy resisting us in an attempt to erect an advance line of earthworks. The fight reached its utmost fury about noon, when the Confederates under the immediate command of General D. A. Hill, but inspired by the presence of General Beauregard, dashed into the Yankee entrenchments, driving the enemy out at the point of the bayonet. A desperate effort, twice repeated, was made by the Yankees to regain their works. But it was all in vain. Besides the fortifications we took a considerable quantity of small arms and several pieces of artillery. Our casualties amounted to five hundred. Among the missing is General W. S. Walker, who rode accidentally into the Yankee lines, and who is reported a prisoner in Butler's hands, having suffered amputation of the foot. Butler's pied-à-terre at Bermuda Hundreds is the most undesirable spot for his army that he could occupy in Virginia. He may remain there till the crack of doom without being able to accomplish anything of importance against Richmond or Petersburg. But if he remains there two months, the ague and fever, the ancient suzerain of the region, will dispute his possession in a manner yet more resistless than Beauregard. His troops will die off in greater numbers than the Earl of Chatham's in the marshes of Walcheren. M'Clellan found the north side of James River as pestilential as the Scheldt, but Harrison's Landing is a salubrious locality in comparison with Bermuda Hundreds.

The city is calm, a fervid sun shines down upon us, all hearts await with anxiety but composure the issue of the impending fight.

The cadets of the Virginian Military Institute have arrived in Richmond.

Dick Taylor has been created a Lieutenant-General. The vote in the Senate confirming the nomination was unanimous.

TUESDAY, May 24.—P.S. Since the foregoing was written a telegram from General Lee informs us that our pickets were driven back from the bridge by which the telegraph road crosses the North Anna, yesterday afternoon, at the same moment that Warren's division was pushed across at Jericho, some two or three miles further up. A. P. Hill's corps at once engaged them and checked their advance. The two armies are now in line of battle, and the great struggle may be fought to-day.

THE ADVANCE OF GRANT—THE FIGHTING—TERRIFIC SLAUGHTER—THE RESULTS OF THE BATTLES—THE LOSSES—THE CASUALTIES AMONGST CONFEDERATE GENERALS—SHERIDAN'S RAID—STUART'S LAST SERVICE TO THE CONFEDERACY—HOW HE WAS WOUNDED—THE PUBLIC GRIEF—HIS CHARACTER—THE SOUTH SIDE—BUTLER'S FORCES—HIS DEFEAT—OTHER MILITARY MOVEMENTS—THE ASPECT OF RICHMOND—ANECDOTE OF PRESIDENT DAVIS AND GENERAL LEE.

Two weeks have passed since the date of my last letter, and these two weeks have been crowded with the most exciting and important events. The combined movement of the enemy upon the Confederate capital has been commenced with desperate energy and immense numbers, and the result is yet undetermined. What has been accomplished by them up to this moment is simply nil, as far as the capture of Richmond is concerned; and their progress, if such it may be called, has been attended with fearful losses, greater, perhaps, than any they have sustained hitherto in the conduct of the war. And the end is not yet.

The movement was made in two, not three columns, as had been foretold by the New York Times. While Grant advanced upon Lee, a great fleet of transports, with Monitors and gunboats, ascended the James River, and landed a force of thirty thousand men at Bermuda Hundreds, which they made a base of operations. The Yankees did not try the Peninsula. That road to Richmond was too thickly strewn with the mournful memories of M'Clellan's disasters in 1862.

The series of battles fought between Lee and Grant since the latter crossed the Rapidan, will demand a large chapter in the history of the war of the Revolution, and we know too little of them in detail to justify me in attempting to collate, from written and oral communications, a continuous narrative for your columns. You have, perhaps, already received the Yankee account of the conflict in the Wilderness on Thursday, the 5th instant, in which Grant obtained so brilliant and decisive a victory over Lee, driving him in confused retreat towards Richmond—a victory so decisive that Lee, who seems somehow to have taken the wrong road to Richmond, has been fighting him ever since, killing and wounding the victorious troops of the Union, and taking them prisoners in considerable numbers. Grant's advance, after the battle of the 5th, was in the direction of Fredericksburg—the route, as Lincoln tells us, he had determined to take from the beginning; and it did so happen that Lee fled, in the most blundering way, in the very footsteps of the conquering hero, so that to all mankind it would appear (to all mankind except the people of the United States) that the conquering hero was retreating, and poor, persecuted, unhappy Lee pursuing—which was, of course, manifestly impossible. Fighting between the two armies occurred every day while thus in motion. On Wednesday, the 11th instant, the enemy attacked our left, which was held by General R. H. Anderson, but were driven back with little difficulty, except in front of Dole's brigade, where they obtained a temporary advantage (the brigade in question having behaved badly), and took a battery of four guns. The assault was made with great spirit by the Yankees; and General Lee, in his official despatch, records that some of them leaped over our breastworks—a sort of exercise which they have not much delighted in hitherto, except in the columns of the New York Herald; but fresh troops coming quickly forward to repair the mischief occasioned by the misconduct of Dole's brigade, they were handsomely repelled, our broken lines were reestablished, and the battery recaptured. All this occurred between sunset and dark. The day following occurred a conflict the most sanguinary, perhaps, of all the terrible battles of this wasting and horrid struggle. The attack was made all along the lines with headlong impetuosity by the enemy, and maintained with peculiar stubbornness for some time in front of Ewell's corps and Johnson's division. The fight raged for ten hours, and with varying fortunes. Early in the day some impression was made upon Johnson's division; the enemy possessed himself of a part of our entrenchments, and captured two thousand prisoners and several pieces of artillery. But they were finally repulsed with tremendous loss. The Yankee dead in front of our lines lay piled one upon another for a long distance. Not at Gaines's Mill, not at Chickamauga, not even at Fredericksburg, around the slippery base of Mary's Heights, was there seen anything comparable to the fearful slaughter of Thursday near Spottsylvania Court House. The Yankees fought with a resolution they have never before exhibited, and the result was a sacrifice of life that will cause the day to be remembered in New England for many generations. On Saturday, the 14th, they made their latest assault, which was partial and comparatively feeble, and which General Wilcox, in the language of General Lee's official telegram, 'handsomely repulsed.' Since Saturday Grant has changed his position, his lines now extending along the north bank of the Ny River, his left wing resting upon Masaponax Church. It is probable that the next engagement between the two armies will be fought in the immediate neighbourhood of Guiney's Station.

So far as we have been enlightened by the Northern papers upon the results of these battles, it would seem that Grant has filled, nay, more than filled, the measure of Yankee expectation: Lee is rapidly retreating on Richmond. We don't see it. But there can be no doubt about the fact. On the 9th, Lincoln, in a gush of pious gratitude, wrote from the White House a letter 'to the friends of Union and Liberty' (whoever they may be), calling upon all patriots to give thanks to Almighty God for the 'army operations of the last five days.' Grant has achieved a signal victory. Let us admit the point. It has done what none of his predecessors were able to accomplish—made his men fight as well in assault of breastworks as in the open field. One writer, in the Herald of the 12th, is so sceptical as to discredit the great advantage gained by Grant since he crossed the Rapidan. He thinks the chance of taking Richmond by the United States rather slim. There is one method of solving the problem of advantage when it seems puzzling, which we have employed, and with results altogether satisfactory to ourselves. The numerical strength of Lee's enemy is greater at this moment, as compared with Grant's, than it was before the fighting began. Our losses have not exceeded fifteen thousand in killed, wounded, missing, and prisoners. Grant has lost certainly not less than fifty thousand. The writer in the Herald, already quoted, sums up Grant's losses, down to the morning of the 9th, at 27,000. Another letter-writer estimates them as high as 38,000. Since these calculations were made, the bloodiest of all his 'victories' have been obtained. More fortunate than Burnside and Hooker, he has not suffered to any great extent by straggling from his ranks, men recrossing the river and running off home. There was a certain amount of confidence felt in the hero of Vicksburg which 'Fighting Joe' was never able to inspire, and which Burnside could still less infuse into his troops. Grant's losses are all to be set down to the account of the 'rebels.' They cannot be less at this moment than 50,000, and they may reach 60,000.

Looking to the character of our loss, it has been severe. You will not have failed to remark the painful coincidence by which just one year after our mighty captain of war, Stonewall Jackson, was shot down in the Wilderness, Longstreet was shot upon the very same ground and under circumstances strikingly similar. Both had successfully executed a flank movement which was conclusive of the issue of the day's operations. Both bore to General Lee, as the Commander-in-Chief, the relation of right-arm in the death-grapple with the enemy. And both fell by the bullets of our own men. Here, let us hope, the sad parallel will cease. General Longstreet's wound was in the shoulder, and, though severe, is not thought dangerous. It will pretty surely incapacitate him, however, for further service in the field during the summer campaign, and the loss of his splendid qualities for the time being will be great indeed.

The same cruel volley by which Longstreet received his wound deprived the Confederate army of one of its most gallant young officers, in the person of Brigadier-General Jenkins of South Carolina, who fell quite dead to the earth. We have also to deplore the deaths of Brigadier-Generals J. M. Jones, Stafford, Perrin, and Daniel, all killed on the field or surviving their wounds but a few hours. Among our wounded were Brigadier-Generals Pegram, Benning, Ramseur, M'Gowan, R. D. Johnston, Jas. M. Walker, H. H. Walker, and Hayes. I may not go below the rank of general to mention many officers of the highest worth who fell at the head of their men cheering them to victory. Virginia, and I doubt not many a sister State, mourns the flower of her youth and chivalry cut down untimely. But to the casualties already mentioned I must add Major-General Edward Johnson, of Virginia, and Brigadier-General George H. Steuart, of Maryland, missing. I need not say that great solicitude is felt concerning these gallant officers.

The loss of the enemy in officers is but little known to us. Generals Hayes, Wadsworth, and Sedgwick have been killed, Generals Webb and Getty are mentioned in the Northern papers as wounded, and Generals Seymour and Shaler are prisoners in our hands. We shall probably hear of others commanding brigades who have been placed hors de combat.

While Grant's army was engaged with Lee's army in the Wilderness—a region in which, as its name would imply, there was but little opportunity afforded for the employment of cavalry—a large force under General Sheridan, belonging to this arm of the Federal service, was sent across the country to cut the railroads connecting General Lee with the capital. Nine thousand strong, they moved with compactness and rapidity to Beaver Dam on the Central Railroad, where they captured and destroyed three trains of cars laden with provisions. Thence they came to Ashland on the Fredericksburg Railroad, seventeen miles north of the city, where they were met and stoutly resisted at daybreak on the morning of the 11th by a portion of Fitz Lee's horse under command of Colonel Thomas T. Mumford; and continuing their course southward, they encountered, on the afternoon of the same day, at the Yellow Tavern, six miles from town, a body of Confederate cavalry under the personal lead of General J. E. B. Stuart, who had been pursuing them all the way from Spottsylvania. General Stuart's object was to hold one of the roads by which Sheridan hoped to make his escape after doing all the damage in his power to the railroads. In this object he was successful, and it was the last service that Stuart was permitted to render to the State and the Confederacy. A desperate fight ensued, hand to hand, in the high road, filled with frantic horses and cumbered with the dead and dying, Sheridan attempting to cut his way through, but being driven back with considerable loss. In this brilliant but unhappy combat, I grieve to write, General Stuart, the goodliest knight of all our band, fell mortally wounded. Before pausing to speak of an event so lamentable, let me say in brief that, after some skirmishing the next day with infantry sent out from this city to intercept them, Sheridan's force succeeded in crossing the Chickahominy upon a bridge which they constructed for themselves, and are now in the Peninsula.

General Stuart fell in gathering his men to resist a heavy onset of the enemy upon the left of his line. Before he had time for forming the column, the Yankees came with tremendous weight upon the small party of which he was the centre, and which could offer only a feeble opposition to their overwhelming numbers. It is quite certain that they recognised him, and the escape of his personal staff was probably due to the fact that their fire was concentrated upon his stalwart form alone. Twelve shots were fired at him at short range in rapid succession. The last shot struck him in the stomach on the left side. With his characteristic self-possession, he discharged every barrel of his revolver at his assailants, and then, feeling that his wound would soon cause him to fall from his seat and thus place him in the enemy's hands, he collected all his energies, and, turning his horse's head, galloped into our lines. Reeling from the saddle, he fell into the arms of one of his devoted troopers. He was brought into Richmond in an ambulance, and conveyed to the house of his brother-in-law, Dr. Brewer, where he died on Thursday, the 12th inst., at 5 P.M., the anniversary of the day on which the obsequies of Jackson had been celebrated in Richmond one year before. General Stuart retained his faculties until within a very short time of the last scene of all. He had a most affecting interview with the President. He disposed of many little objects as mementoes to his personal friends. His sword he gave to his son. He was calm and tranquil in his trust in Jesus Christ as his Redeemer. One disappointment only disturbed his last moments. He had hoped to see his wife and children. They did not reach Richmond until he had been dead four hours.

The grief of our citizens when it was known that Stuart was indeed no more, was deep and universal. The roar of the enemy's guns was sounding in their ears, and they might not pause to indulge in unavailing sentiment or the usual manifestations of public sorrow. Some poor funeral rights they might have rendered, with bells and wailing music, and military escort (the cannonade without the gates supplied the minute guns), but that the broken-hearted widow requested that all such honours might be withheld. The burial service was conducted at St. James's Church, according to the beautiful ritual of the Book of Common Prayer. The affection and sadness of the community found a sweet and grateful expression in flowers. Crowns and wreaths, and garlands of camellias, and roses, and lilies, covered the coffin. A floral cross instead of his cavalry sabre lay on the knight's breast. Knowing his passion for flowers, and how he loved to ride into battle with a bouquet at his saddle-bow, I could not repress the thought, frivolous as it may have been in the presence of death, that poor Stuart would have been gratified to see his own funeral. And so they carried him to Hollywood, many distinguished soldiers and civilians bearing the pall.

It is not for me to characterise the military genius or to record the great services of Jeb. Stuart. To him attaches as much of the romance of the struggle as to any other hero of the time. He was a preux chevalier. He delighted in the rolling of the bugles and the prancing of the steeds, and he had perhaps a weakness, such as Murat betrayed to a far greater extent, for the ostentation of the parade. But his wants were simple, and his habits conformed to the severest formula in the field. His vitality was wonderful, and his endurance almost superhuman. He was fond of a review, a tournament, or a bal dansé, but he never complained of long watches, or perilous rides, or short rations. The most acceptable present that could have been offered him at any time since he was made a Major-General, I think, would have been a sweeping black ostrich plume. Next to that, he would have probably preferred a pair of buckskin breeches. Always gay, if not his motto, was at least his life. He had men about him who contributed to the innocent hilarity of headquarters. He kept a baritone, if possible, on his staff. A master of the banjo was one of his military family. And yet he fell into no excesses. While his sword was stainless, his life was singularly pure. He always carried his Bible in his haversack, and he was 'constant in prayer.' Foreign gentlemen went to his camp, after visiting the headquarters of Lee and Jackson, and came back to Richmond saying that our generals were very extraordinary men, and Stuart the greatest puzzle of them all—that they didn't drink, they didn't game, they didn't smoke, and yet, without wine, cards, or tobacco, they were uniformly cheerful, and that Stuart was always as jolly as he could be.

And now, like the dead campeador astride of Bavieca, he rides out of the history of the war; and this careless correspondence, which has spoken of him so often, will record fresh exploits of his no more. Finis coronat opus.

I have stated that the boom of cannon was heard in Richmond while Stuart lay dying. I must now turn to the south side, and make mention of the efforts made by the enemy in that quarter, and of the preparations of the Confederate authorities to repel them. As I have said, the enemy landed a force of 30,000 men at Bermuda Hundreds, on the right bank of the James River, one mile above the mouth of the Appomattox, and eleven miles overland from Petersburg, situated on the right bank of the latter stream. The troops were brought round in an immense fleet of transports under convoy of five Monitors and six gunboats, and the whole wide expanse of the James, at its confluence with the Appomattox, was thickly dotted with vessels of all sorts and sizes. Gilmore came from Charleston with a large part of the fleet so long engaged there, and the sappers and miners from Morris Island, and 'Baldy' Smith brought up his whole force, comprising several negro regiments, from Fortress Monroe. The entire expedition was under command of General Butler. As early as the 6th the gunboats ascended the river, cautiously looking for torpedoes, and on the afternoon of that day one of them was blown into fragments by a torpedo at a point eight miles below Drewry's Bluff. The next day a detachment of the Elliott Battalion, with two pieces of artillery, under command of Major Starke, captured and destroyed a second gunboat near Turkey Island. A third was sunk in the Appomattox on the afternoon of the 9th, in an attack on Fort Clifton, one of the defences of Petersburg. The disembarkation at Bermuda Hundreds having been effected, the Yankees moved forward to secure the line of the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad, and thus interrupt the communication between the two cities, and heavy skirmishing took place on the 6th and 7th at Port Walthall Junction, five miles from Petersburg; the Confederates under Colonel Bushrod W. Johnson obstinately contesting their advance. No serious attempt at the reduction of Richmond was made, however, until midnight of the 14th, when a storming party of Yankees assailed the works at Drewry's Bluff, and were repulsed without difficulty. Yesterday this was twice repeated—at 9 o'clock in the morning and at 2 in the afternoon—with the same result. In the meantime General Beauregard had arrived from North Carolina and taken command of our forces. To-day a combined attack was made upon the enemy's position by General Beauregard from the direction of Richmond, and General Whiting from the direction of Petersburg. Some delay on the part of General Whiting alone prevented the utter rout of all Butler's troops. General Robert Ransom, commanding on the left of Beauregard, by marching down the river bank turned the enemy's right and drove him in precipitation from the field. Fifteen hundred prisoners, including Brigadier-General Heckman of Massachusetts and staff, have arrived at the Libby. Butler has withdrawn into the narrow space between the James and Appomattox, where, under cover of his gunboats and behind entrenchments extending from river to river, he holds a very strong position, but can do no harm.

Our losses on the south side have been heavier comparatively than in Spottsylvania—one hundred and fifty killed and one thousand wounded, up to the present writing. Brigadier-General Mat. Ransom, a brother of the general, who commanded on Beauregard's left, received a painful but not serious wound in the wrist of the bridle hand, breaking one of the bones.

From the files of Richmond papers which I send herewith, you will gather what has been done by Spears and other raiding parties, in cutting the railroads. The injury they have wrought is inconsiderable and will prove temporary. Averell's forces, you will perceive, have been scattered in the south-western portion of Virginia, and General Breckenridge has obtained a brilliant victory over Sigel at Newmarket, in Shenandoah County. In this last engagement the cadets of the Virginian Military Institute, boys between fifteen and eighteen years of age, the pets of our Southern Polytechnic, took an active and distinguished part. Five of the little heroes were killed, and fifteen wounded. You will recollect that Stonewall Jackson was a professor in this Military Institute.

The aspect of Richmond during this troubled fortnight has been exceedingly impressive. The shops have been closed, and all sounds of business have ceased. The whole male population capable of bearing arms has again gone to the trenches. The lower part of the city is as deserted as the disinhumed streets of Pompeii. The hotels are silent and listless, and the theatres have suspended their entertainments. Throughout the town the clatter of the quartermaster's wagon, and the awful creak of the ambulance, bearing the wounded to the hospital, are the only noises that mingle with the boom of the cannonade. May, in all her beauty, has come, unknowing of human conflict, with her tender greenery of leaf and lawn, her glowing noons, and her pensive twilights; yet capricious withal, at times making the natural as dark as the political heavens, and mocking the artillery of the combatants with the tremendous peals of the elemental strife. There has been no exodus of the inhabitants of the city, and no panic among the women, who, with a devotion unalterable, and a Christian benevolence that never wavers, are ministering to the wounded soldiers night and day. Many sorrow over the dearly-loved dead, all sorrow at the country's agony; but a time cometh when their sorrow shall be turned into joy.

My letter has far exceeded the usual limits, and yet I must give an anecdote of General Lee and President Davis before I close it.

During Friday, the 6th instant, as Longstreet's corps was replacing A. P. Hill's in the line, and the divisions of Hart and Wilcox had been thrown into some confusion, General Lee rode forward and called upon a Texan brigade to follow him into the fight. The men cheered their noble leader; but cried out that they would only advance upon condition that he should retire, and then, as if to show their full appreciation of the great honour that had been paid them, rushed upon the enemy and fought splendidly. When President Davis heard of this, he sat down and wrote a very pretty letter of affectionate expostulation to General Lee, reminding him that he ought not lightly to expose a life of such incalculable value to his country, and the next day President Davis rode out from Drewry's Bluff into a very hot fire of Yankee artillery, and only withdrew upon a shell exploding within fifty yards of him!

Congress is still in session; but its proceedings have been of little interest since the great battle for Richmond has been in progress.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA: May 2, 1864.

THE MEETING OF CONGRESS—MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT—THE NEW MEMBERS—MILITARY REPRESENTATIVES—MR. W. C. RIVES—CHANGES IN THE SENATE—THE WORK OF CONGRESS—THE CURRENCY—THE $5 NOTES—DEATH OF PRESIDENT DAVIS'S SON—FIRE AT WILMINGTON—GRANT'S ADVANCE ANTICIPATED.

THE Second Congress of the Confederate States was convened to-day in the Capitol of Virginia. Upon the first call of the roll a quorum was found to be in attendance in both Houses, and the work of organisation was very speedily accomplished by the reelection of all the old officers. The Hon. Thomas S. Bocock, as Speaker of the House of Representatives, on taking the chair, made his usual address, while the Hon. R. M. T. Hunter resumed his place as President of the Senate pro tempore (in the absence of the Vice-President, Mr. Stephens), without a speech, and shortly afterwards the message of the President was transmitted to Congress through his private secretary and read by the clerks, and then both Houses adjourned for the day. The message, a copy of which I send you with this letter, is remarkable for its brevity, its pure English, and its good temper. Beyond these excellences, the last two characteristics of the President's State papers, the message is of no great consequence. There was little for the President to say, and he has said it very well. His counsel with regard to the currency is wise; his tribute to the patriotism of the army and the people is fervid and well-deserved, his rebuke of foreign governments for their injustice, so studied and long maintained, to the Confederate States, is forcible without lack of dignity—let us hope that his prophecy (it is the first time that the President has indulged in prophecy) that the war will terminate with the current year may be verified. It will be observed that no assurance is given in the message that the exchange of prisoners will be carried on in future under the cartel; what has been done recently has been informal and irregular, and though prisoners continue to arrive and depart by the flag-of-truce boats from time to time, the exchanges are conducted on no satisfactory basis, and may be stopped by the enemy, without notice, at any moment. The humanity which is manifested in the passage where mention is made of the mortality among the Federal prisoners in our hands, cannot but impress the mind of the foreign reader with the Christian tenderness of heart of Jefferson Davis; nor will it escape observation that the recent successes of our arms are cited in no vain-glorious spirit as matter of national exultation, but as furnishing good cause for gratitude to Almighty God, and as inspiring troops and people with renewed energy for future achievements.

The complexion of the Congress is materially changed since the late session—a change which is the more readily observed on the floor of the Lower House, in the introduction to a larger degree of the military element, as shown in the new members of the body. Out of ninety-nine representatives entitled to seats (the Missouri Delegation has yet to be elected) forty-three are novi homines, and many, perhaps a majority of these, are captains, majors, colonels, and generals fresh from the camp. It should be stated, however, that few of them have relinquished the sword without honourable testimonials of service, which, in some instances, are marks of permanent disability. When the members elect from Georgia came to the Speaker's desk to take the oath of office, it was remarked, with evident and very natural sensibility on the part of all persons, that two of them (Messrs. Mark H. Blandford and George N. Lester) had lost an arm, and that one (Hon. James M. Smith) hobbled up the aisle on a wooden leg. Virginia has also her mutilated representative in the person of the Hon. F. W. M. Holliday, who wears an empty sleeve (the right one), and so there were one-armed spectators in the galleries, all companions in the glory of the battle. One of Virginia's new representatives (Hon. W. C. Wickham), elected from the Richmond district, is a cavalry general who has been an active participant, under Jeb. Stuart, in all the military operations on the Potomac, in the Peninsula, and along the Rapidan, since the beginning of the war; and he finds himself, according to the rule laid down by the last Congress, compelled to choose finally between his seat in the saddle at the head of his brigade, and his seat in the Lower House, just at the inopportune moment when the enemy is about making an advance in heavy force for the reduction of the Confederate capital. He is just now in attendance upon Congress, not having as yet been sworn in; but it is not unlikely that the trumpets sounding to horse may cause him to relinquish his legislative duties before the Speaker shall have appointed the regular Standing Committees.

It remains to be seen whether the House of Representatives has gained or lost in legislative ability by the change of members. No disparagement is made of the retired gentlemen of the Virginia Delegation of the last Congress when I say that the single accession of William C. Rives to the public councils will more than compensate for any talent withdrawn in their removal. [Mr. Foote of Tennessee, in offering a resolution this morning that the Speaker should proceed, with as little delay as possible, to the appointment of the Standing Committees, desired not to be considered as a candidate for the place of Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which he had filled during the last session, and alluded very gracefully to Mr. Rives, as everybody understood, as the proper person for that position.] Au reste, we shall miss the eloquence of Walter Preston of Virginia; and the elevated statesmanship of Mr. Curry of Alabama, than whom there is not a man of sounder practical sense or more systematic habits of thought and study in the Confederacy; and the varied learning of Mr. Holcombe, the predecessor of Mr. Rives; and the parliamentary experience of other gentlemen that might be named. But time will show whether the new-comers may not make the second Congress wiser and stronger than the first.

In the Senate there have been but few changes. Hon. Wm. L. Graham, of North Carolina, succeeds Hon. George Dair, recently appointed Attorney-General of the Confederate States; Hon. Richard W. Walker, of Alabama, succeeds Hon. C. C. Clay; and Hon. John W. C. Watson, of Mississippi, succeeds Hon. James Phelan. Mr. Graham had something like a national reputation under the old Government, and was the candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the ticket with Winfield Scott in the memorable Presidential campaign of 1852, in which old 'Fuss and Feathers,' as he was called, was beaten by Franklin Pierce. The retirement of Mr. Clay has excited much regret. He had been long in public life, had served in the Senate of the United States, and by literary culture and the amenity of his manners adorned the position in which his talents as a statesman were most usefully exerted. His successor, Mr. Walker, brings with him the prestige of scholarship and eminence at the bar, and much is confidently expected of him in the career of distinction which he is invited to pursue. Mr. Watson is quite unknown beyond the limits of his own State—Mississippi—and enters the national Legislature for the first time. We have the assurance of his worth, however, in the fact that the Legislature of Mississippi—the State of President Davis—would not send an ordinary man to the Senate in times like these.

The work which Congress has to do at its present session will depend in a great degree on the events of the next four or five weeks. It is altogether possible that such decisive results may be obtained in the field, within that time, that the enemy may be brought to make overtures for peace. It is also possible that such a change may take place in the attitude of foreign Powers towards the Confederacy, arising out of the affairs of Mexico, within that time, that legislation may become necessary in relation thereto which is not now contemplated. In either contingency, the session might be indefinitely prolonged. But neither contingency is likely to happen. The attention of Congress will therefore be directed to matters purely domestic, as is most probable, and of such matters the currency will receive the earliest notice. The financial bother has to do with the five-dollar notes of the old issue, which, under the Currency Bill, were not required to be withdrawn from circulation until July 1, 1864. The status of these notes is an anomaly in monetary affairs. As April 1 approached, when all notes of a higher denomination were required to be funded east of the Mississippi, the fives came to be in great request, and were readily sold by the brokers at from 15 to 20 per cent. premium. Since April 1 they have been steadily declining, as the new issue has come slowly into circulation, and now they are held by the brokers at 20 per cent. discount. This depreciation is felt to be a hardship by a very large class of the community who are holders of the notes—the larger class, as the small sum represented by the notes insures their distribution among the poor, the farmer with a ten-acre lot and one negro, the sempstress who has been singing that old plaintive 'Song of the Shirt' for the Government, the mechanic and the labourer. A remedy has been proposed for the evil—that Congress should place these degraded fives upon the same footing with the new currency. But the objections are serious. There are ninety millions of these degraded fives. To declare so immense an amount current funds, after provision had been made for retiring it, would be seriously to impair the beneficial working of the Currency Bill, the chief object of which was to reduce the bulk of Government issues. But more than this, while the fives are in the hands of the many—the labouring poor—in small quantities, they are in the hands of the few—namely, the rich brokers—in large quantities. The brokers have swindled the public by a twofold process in the management of the fives—first, by selling them at 20 per cent. premium, and, second, by buying them at 20 per cent. discount; and now that their vaults are as full of the notes as the last carpet-bag, that wouldn't lock on any terms and was almost bursting, of the miscellaneous addenda of Robinson's or Brown's wardrobe on their continental tour, now they, the patriotic brokers, would gladly have Congress restore the fives to such confidence as the public have in the rest of Mr. Memminger's issues. Congress will hardly do it. But a strong effort will be made in the matter; there will be much debate, and time and money will be consumed before the quietus is given to the proposition. It is likely enough that something will be done or said on the exchange of prisoners, and on Earl Russell's plan of having a quasi representative of England here to be the medium of communication with Jefferson Davis, the 'so-called' President of the 'so-called' Confederate States; but all this should not keep Congress together beyond June 15.

Our whole community has been deeply pained by a sad accident in the family of President Davis. His little son, Joseph, a bright-eyed boy, five years of age, fell, Saturday afternoon, from a portico of the President's house, a distance of eighteen feet, upon a brick pavement in the yard, sustaining injuries of which he died in twenty minutes thereafter. The public sympathy with the President and Mrs. Davis, in their grievous affliction, was becomingly manifested in the large attendance upon the funeral ceremonies, which were conducted yesterday afternoon at St. Paul's Church. The interment was made in Hollywood Cemetery.

You will herewith receive intelligence of the disastrous fire which occurred at Wilmington on the morning of the 29th ult., destroying property, principally cotton, to the amount of five millions. The Government is not the heaviest loser in this calamity, but it will be greatly embarrassed by the delay which will be occasioned in loading its ships now in port for Bermuda and Nassau.

The enemy has evacuated Washington, N. C., and our forces under General Hoke are in possession. The advance of Grant will be made in the course of a very few days. The telegraph to-day reports his army to be in motion upon both flanks of General Lee's position. A considerable force of Yankees has been landed at Gloucester Point and West Point at the mouth and head of York River, and the Peninsular movement will be made simultaneously with Grant's demonstration. May will not glide into June before momentous events shall have occurred.

CONFEDERATE AND FEDERAL LOSSES.—The Richmond Examiner of May 18, commenting on recent battles, says:—'In these two battles the army of Northern Virginia has enjoyed, for the first time, the advantages of firing into the enemy with grape and rifle balls from lines of substantial breastworks; and if one may judge from the high spirits and unbounded confidence of the wounded men who have come to this city from the battle, it has been highly gratified by the new position. "We just mowed them every time,"—such is the only account they give of the struggle. The Confederate loss, killed, wounded, and missing, in all these battles, beginning with the Wilderness and concluding with that of Thursday last (May 12), at Spottsylvania Court House, was under fifteen thousand. The Washington Chronicle, the organ of Lincoln, that sees all things in the rose's colour, announces the "depletion" of Grant's army by the battle of the Wilderness and "other causes," to have been, on Tuesday evening ascertained, thirty-five thousand. To this awful figure must now be added the two days of unsuccessful assault on the breastworks of Spottsylvania—assault without manœuvre, full in front, with deep columns, each forcing the other on the muzzles of the guns—wherein the carnage and loss must, in the necessity of things, have been many times greater than in the open battles of the Wilderness and succeeding days. Putting the two data together, it is impossible to doubt the deduction that Grant's "depletion" by killing, wounding, and "other causes"—that is to say, by straggling, desertion, &c.—has surpassed seventy thousand. The disproportion of numbers between the antagonists was very great when the Federal general crossed the Rapidan, and it is probable that he has since received the troops originally retained to defend Washington; but that disproportion was wonderfully reduced when the sun went down on Thursday afternoon.'

FEDERAL MENDACITY.—The Mobile Register of May 25 says: 'The mendacity of the Federal generals in their official bulletins and reports is something very remarkable. We do not remember one of them who has distinguished himself as an exception, by confining himself to the simple truth. We expected better things of General M'Clellan, but he was no exception. We have already exposed the enormous falsehood of Grant about Johnson's division. General Sherman has been taking his turn at this Yankee habit. He despatches to Washington that he whipped General Johnston at Resaca, and took the place after severe fighting, and with a loss of 3,000 on his side; also, that he captured 8 guns and 10,000 prisoners. The truth is, he was completely repulsed at Resaca, and took the place, not by fighting, but by a flank movement, which required General Johnston to abandon the town in his own change of front. The prisoners and guns are myths.'

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

GENERAL GRANT has moved his army to the south side of the James River. He is, after a month's carnage, situated as M'Clellan was two years ago, and he is in a position which he might have attained without the loss of a single brigade. So far the Northern commander has been utterly foiled. He cared not for the lives of his men; but after thousands had been killed and tens of thousands wounded, he learned that by no sacrifice of human life would it be possible to reach Richmond by the road he had selected. A glance at the history of the present campaign shows how reluctantly Grant was forced to adopt the plans of M'Clellan.

No one who has read the accounts of the battles on the 3rd and 12th inst. will be surprised that Grant found it necessary to make a change of base, or what some Northerners call a great strategic movement. On those two occasions the Confederates fought behind breastworks, and, to quote the words of one of their officers, 'they mowed down the enemy.' While 'the fields were blue with the Yankee slain,' the Confederates suffered very little. It is estimated that, on the 3rd, whilst the Federals lost 6,000 men, the Confederate loss was not more than 600 men. The Richmond Examiner says, in reference to this fight, 'The battle yesterday and the evening before was a desperate and bloody one for the enemy. They were mowed down like grass as they charged our fortifications. A gentleman who has been through the war tells us that he never saw a field so literally strewn with dead Yankees. We hear of several estimates of their loss; but the most reasonable one, and one made by a gentleman who was over the field, thinks that it could not have been less than six thousand in killed and wounded. Our loss was comparatively slight, most of the fighting having been done by us behind breastworks. It is thought that it will not exceed some five hundred in killed and wounded. A great portion of our wounded were but slightly injured.'

The rumour of the capture of Petersburg by Smith's corps, we are told in the New York telegram, 'requires confirmation,' and as we have no other than New York information we must wait for the next mail to know whether it is true. It is also said that Sheridan has been defeated. About this no doubt is expressed, but no details are given.

GENERAL HUNTER reports, or else Mr. Stanton reports for him, that he captured 1,500 prisoners, 3,000 small arms, and 3 cannons on the 5th. The Confederate authorities deny that the enemy made any such captures.

THE news from Sherman is significant. we have no longer glowing reports of his pursuing a demoralised army; but we are told that Sherman came up with the Confederate army, and instead of attacking it began entrenching his position.

General Sturgis, who left Memphis with 8,000 men to reinforce Sherman, has been completely defeated at Guntown, West Tennessee, by General Forrest. Sturgis was killed. All the Federal artillery train, ammunition, and many prisoners were captured, and the remnant of the expedition returned to Memphis.

IT is reported that General Morgan has been defeated at Cynthiana with a loss of 600 killed and wounded, and that he retreated in a demoralised condition. It is not likely that General Morgan has suffered any serious reverse, and this report probably refers in the usual exaggerated style to the surprise and defeat of a small division of his command.

IT has come out, from a recent debate in the Federal Congress, that General Grant has purposely abstained from using the negro troops of his command in action. The statement was made by Mr. Cox, of Ohio; and the only answer that could be offered to it was, that there were at the time 150 wounded coloured soldiers in the hospitals. A remarkably small proportion this, out of over 50,000 wounded in the battles since May 3, and one which confirms instead of refuting Mr. Cox's assertion, especially as it is known that in one corps alone of Grant's army (Burnside's) there are over 10,000 negro troops.

IN our last number we gave a Northern version of the capture of the Water Witch, in which it was stated that it was a surprise, and there was no fighting. It will be seen, from the official report to the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, that the prize was not secured without a fight.

ON June 7, the 'Republican Nominating Convention' met at Baltimore. The morning session was under the temporary presidency of Dr. Breckinridge. In the evening the permanent officers were appointed, Mr. W. Dennison, ex-Governor of Ohio, being chosen President. On this occasion, Parson Brownlow spoke for the purpose of recommending Andrew Johnson for the Vice-Presidency. He said: 'We have a man down there whom it has been my good luck and bad fortune to fight untiringly for the last twenty-five years—Andrew Johnson. For the first time, in the providence of God, three years ago, we got together on the same platform, and we are now fighting the devil, Tom Walker, and Jeff. Davis side by side. I never refuse to speak when I am able to speak, and my old friend Deacon Bross knows it well. I should like to help him canvass Illinois, and gouge for him among these copperheads. If I were able to speak, and could interest you, I would; but I am sick, and must be excused.' These observations were loudly applauded.

On the 8th, after some discussion and voting as to admitting delegates from Arkansas, Louisiana, and other States and territories, and which ended in the admission of some with, and others without, the right of voting, Mr. Raymond, of New York, read the resolution, or platform, which we elsewhere publish.

Mr. Lincoln was then nominated for President. The following was the result of the ballot:—

FOR MR. LINCOLN.

Maine	14	Indiana	26
New Hampshire	10	Illinois	32
Vermont	10	Michigan	16
Massachusetts	24	Wisconsin	16
Rhode Island	8	Iowa	16
Connecticut	12	Minnesota	8
New York	66	California	10
New Jersey	14	Oregon	6
Pennsylvania	52	West Virginia	10
Delaware	6	Kansas	6
Maryland	14	Nebraska	6
Louisiana	14	Colorado	6
Arkansas	10	Nevada	6
Tennessee	15
Kentucky	22	Total	497
Ohio	42

FOR GENERAL GRANT.

Missouri	22

For Vice-President there were four candidates, Messrs. Johnson, Hamlin, Rousseau, and Dickinson. Mr. Andrew Johnson was nominated. After electing a National Committee, the Convention—which is called at the North the Shoddy or Contractors' Convention—adjourned sine die. We need hardly add that Mr. Lincoln accepted the nomination of his own Convention.

GENERAL LONGSTREET was, at latest dates, nearly convalescent. On May 18 he wrote to Judge A. B. Longstreet: 'My wound is severe, but not dangerous. It is through the neck and shoulder. I am improving.'

IN another part of our impression will be found a lengthy correspondence between various persons on the subject of the contest between the Alabama and the Kearsage. The chief point which is brought under our notice is the conduct of Mr. Lancaster, of the yacht Deerhound, in saving the lives of Captain Semmes and others of the crew of the Alabama. On this point our readers will agree with us that Mr. Lancaster has amply proved the uprightness and honour of his proceedings. He claims for himself the credit of having saved human lives without reference to the nationality of the persons saved. Had the result of the combat been different, and the crew of the Kearsage been struggling in the waves, Mr. Lancaster would have felt it his duty to pursue a similar course; but we doubt if, among Southern sympathisers, he would have found persons ready to look upon an act of humanity in the light of a breach of international law.

THE Federal Provost-Marshal-General submitted a report to Mr. Stanton on June 6, which is a fair gauge of the war spirit of the North. He writes:—

In accordance with the amended Enrolment Act, approved February 24, 1864, and your orders on the subject, I am now conducting a draft in various sub-districts for their various deficiencies on quotas of troops heretofore assigned. The results of the draft, so far as shown by the reports to this date, are worthy of attention. They are briefly as follows:—

Number of drafted men examined	14,741
Number exempted for physical disability	4,374
Number exempted for other causes	2,632
Total number exempted	7,016
Number paid commutation money	5,050
Number who have furnished substitutes	1,416
Number held for personal service	1,259

This last includes some who may yet pay commutation money.

Total not exempted	7,725

These reports come from sub-districts in eight different States.

Thus, half the drafted men claim and are allowed exemption. Of the rest, five-sevenths pay the commutation money, and one-seventh find substitutes. Out of 14,741 drafted men, only 1,259 are held for personal service, and this includes 'some who may yet pay commutation money.' Mr. Stanton and Provost-Marshal Fry suggest the repeal of the $300 exemption clause, but we doubt if Mr. Lincoln will venture on the enforcement of a bonâ fide draft.

AN article in Hunt's Merchants' Magazine for June gives a lucid statement of the present financial condition of the United States. From February 2 to May 14 the increase in the debt was $257,645,212—that is, at the rate of $2,525,933 per day, or about $1,000,000,000 per annum. Out of the $257,645,212 increase of the debt in 102 days—that is, from February 2 to May 14—only $56,700,772 was from the sales of Government stocks, the remainder being from issues of paper currency. The increase of the currency from July 1863, to May 14, 1864, was at the rate of $1,000,000 per day, 'and this constitutes about one-half of the aggregate increase of the Government debt. The national banks have, in the same period, added about $16,000,000 to the currency, making the total increase about $316,000,000.' From this it may be seen that, though defeat may hasten, victory cannot avert, a financial crash.

OUR Richmond letters are full of interesting items. Our readers will sympathise with our correspondent's amusement and amazement at the unparalleled mendacity of Northern authorities in reference to Grant's campaign. Besides a notice of the new members of Congress, and other matters more or less important, our correspondent gives an account of Stuart's last fight and death, and in truly describing his character pays a fitting and touching tribute to the memory of the hero.

A CONVENTION of the American Medical Society has just been held in New York. In the course of the second day's proceedings (June 8) Professor Gardiner offered a series of resolutions asking—we will quote from the New York Herald—'the Government to permit a flag-of-truce boat to go South with medicines, to be applied for the benefit of wounded rebel and Union soldiers in rebel hospitals, who, from the exigencies of war, cannot be properly treated by the surgeons of the rebel army. In offering the resolutions, Dr. Gardiner said he was actuated by motives of common humanity, and for the advancement of medical science he hoped they would be adopted.' We will also give the result of this proposition in the words of the Herald: 'After a full consideration of the subject—many of the members expressing their disapprobation—on a vote being taken, the resolutions were tabled.'

ON the 18th inst. the price of gold was 95¾ premium; the House of Representatives, under the urgent representations of Mr. Chase, have passed a bill forbidding time bargains and their negotiation in public places. The New York papers of the 14th inst. say: 'The House to-day passed the Gold Bill, with Mr. Hooper's substitute for the first section, by a strictly party vote. Up to to-day there was evidently a majority against it, but under the urgent representations of Secretary Chase of the necessity of such action, and the advance of gold to nearly two hundred per cent. the administration members either voted for it or did not vote at all, willing that the experiment should be tried, though with but little faith in its efficacy as a check upon the advancing premium on gold.'

ENGLAND.

THE noble ship Royal Sovereign, the pride and glory of the Admiralty and Captain Coles, made her official trial on June 23. She is entered in the 'Navy List' as an iron-cased cupola ship of 3,963 tons, driven by engines of 800 horse-power (by Maudslay, Sons, & Field), driving a common two-bladed screw of 18 feet diameter, the length of the ship being 250 feet, and her extreme breadth 63 feet. Her armament consists of 5 12½-ton guns, or 300-pounders. The diameter of their bore is 10½ inches, and had they been rifled they would have been 300-pounders; but not being so, they throw 150 lb. spherical shot with a 40 lb. charge of powder. There are four turrets, the foremost of which contains two guns, and the other three one gun each. From the plane of the table on which the guns and their carriages rest, the turrets have a clear interior height of 9 feet, and plenty of space for the working of the guns. 13 men will be stationed in the foremost turret, and 9 men in each of the others. The contrivances for training and reloading, and for whipping up the shot from the deck below, are most ingenious. It is believed that the causes to which the Federal commanders attributed the failure of the cupola ships in the bombardment of Charleston do not exist in the Royal Sovereign. The Federal ships exposed 13 feet of turret to the enemy's fire, while the turrets of the English ship are only 5 feet and 4 feet 3 inches above the deck; for the base and working portion of her turrets rest upon the lower and not the upper deck. Moreover, the turrets of the Federal ships became fixed, and refused to turn after their delicate turning machinery had been injured by the shot of the enemy. It is believed that the revolution of the turrets of the Royal Sovereign could not be obstructed by any blows dealt at the turret. The weight of these is distributed over a large space, while the base is thoroughly protected. Indeed, the table on which the turret stands is pivoted in its centre upon a wrought-iron cylinder, sufficiently large for a man to pass through, while the weight is distributed on bevelled wheels over a metal roadway equalling the turret's circumference in a manner similar to a railway turntable. Her capacity for affording comfort to officers and men is far superior to that of any iron-cased ship afloat, and is to be attributed to the fact that she is a 'three-decker' cut down. This fact also has the disadvantage of increasing her draught of water. In this trial she drew 21 ft. 2 in. forward and 24 ft. 10 in. aft; her top-sides (that is, measuring from the top of her side armour to the water line) were 7 ft. 6 in. out of water amidships. At full steam her true mean speed in the face of a strong north-westerly breeze was 11·006 knots. The draught in the fires was somewhat defective; and it is thought that when that matter is remedied, she will attain half a knot more. The ship was very steady, the only movement being a slight lateral one in her turrets. The ship is placed under the command of Captain Sherard Osborne, C.B., and can be made ready for sea in twenty-four hours. It is no piece of presumption to assert that she is the most powerful vessel afloat.

The new screw steam frigate Ocean was tried off Plymouth last week. She was launched on March 9, 1863, and received her plates at Keyham. She will carry 34 guns, and is classed with the Caledonia, Royal Alfred, Royal Oak, and Prince Consort. She will be of about 4,000 tons. Under half-boiler power the mean of four runs was 10·691 knots. Under full-boiler power the mean of six runs gave 12·895 knots. Her machinery appeared to be in perfect order, and the results of the trial were considered satisfactory.

ON Wednesday and on Friday, the 22nd and 24th days of this month, in the Lower House of Convocation, an animated debate was held on the proposed synodical condemnation of the book called 'Essays and Reviews.' In the course thereof the Dean of Ely (Dr. Goodwin) expressed a hope that the House would accede to the petition of Dr. Rowland Williams, and hear the petitioner before condemnation. The Dean of Westminster (Dr. Stanley) addressed the House at very considerable length. He thought that this was an attempt to erect Convocation into a tribunal by which all controversial works might be subject to condemnation. He himself had published a book twenty years ago, which, if published in the present day, would no doubt have been thought a bad, foolish, and wicked book; for it contained passages agreeing in words and in principle with those extracts from 'Essays and Reviews' on which the judgment had been founded. The proposed synodical judgment was ambiguous. It stated that the book contained doctrines opposed to those of the Church of England and of the Catholic Church; but such were mere conventional terms, having no meaning. The judgment failed to discriminate that which was heretical from that which was orthodox; it even omitted to distinguish the authors: all were treated alike, and lumped together in one uniform condemnation. Such a judgment would be only just in case there were an absolute uniform heterodoxy in the book. Even the work which had been written by the Bishops of Ely and Gloucester in reply to 'Essays and Reviews' contained sentiments precisely similar to those now selected for censure. The judgment, also, was nugatory; for its object was to condemn those whom the supreme court had acquitted. Two hundred years ago Convocation had censured Bishop Burnet's book on the Thirty-nine Articles. That book had since been recommended to be read by the students of theology; and he would venture to predict that the time would come when portions of these 'Essays' would also be recommended by theological professors to their pupils. Canon Wordsworth, after referring to the taunts and calumnies thrown at the Church of England by the Church of Rome for its inaction in the matter in question, said that their great difficulty arose from the anomaly that Convocation was at once a deliberative and a judicial body. This fact should induce them to aim at obtaining the great want in the Church of England—namely, a rightly constituted court of appeal. He should vote for the judgment on the ground that portions of the book deserved censure. He hoped, however, that the House would follow the precedent in the case of Whiston in 1711, and allow Dr. Williams to be heard after judgment. At the close of the debate the resolution was put in these words: 'That the House respectfully and heartily tenders its thanks to His Grace the President and to the Bishops of the Upper House for their care in the defence of the faith, and that this House also thankfully accepts and concurs in the condemnation of the book by the Upper House to which their concurrence has been invited.' On the division, the numbers were: for the resolution, 39; against it, 19; majority for the synodical judgment, 20. Canon Wordsworth then moved that the petition of Dr. Williams be sent to the Upper House, with a request that their Lordships would take it into consideration. This motion was negatived.

ADDRESSES of congratulation on the birth of the Prince Albert Victor of Wales from the two Houses of Convocation, the clergy of the cities of London and Westminster, and the three denominations of Protestant Dissenters, were last week received by Her Majesty the Queen in person. The Queen returned a gracious answer in each case, and the principal members of the several deputations had the honour of kissing Her Majesty's hand.

PRINCE ARTHUR, attended by his governor Major Elphinstone, left Woolwich last week on board the Vivid for Ostend. He will make a short visit at Brussels and at the palace of Lacken, and then proceed on a tour through Germany.

THE annual Royal Regatta came off at Henley-on-Thames last week with great éclat. The Grand Challenge Cup was won by the Kingston Rowing Club. In the trial heat this Club defeated Cambridge University by a length and a half, the London Rowing Club being third. In the final heat the Kingston Rowing Club defeated Oxford University, the holders of the Challenge Cup, by half a length after a most severe race. For the Ladies' Challenge Plate, the Eton College Boat Club, the Trinity Hall Boat Club, Cambridge, and the Club of St. Peter's College, Radley, contested the trial heat. The Eton boys, after a gallant race, defeated the Trinity Hall boat by a length, Radley being two lengths astern of Trinity Hall. In the final heat, which was to have been rowed between the University College, Oxford, and the Eton Boys, the Oxford men scratched, their race with the Kingston Club having been too much for them, and the Eton Boat merely rowed over the course. The event was a great disappointment, for there was much curiosity as to the prowess of the Eton boat. It was no small glory for the boys to defeat the Trinity Hall Boat, which this year was the champion boat in the University of Cambridge, and some confidence was felt in the ability of Eton even to defeat the great men of Oxford. The Silver Goblets (pair-oared race) were won by Messrs. Selwyn and Kinglake, of Cambridge University, defeating Messrs. Brickwood and Brickwood of London. For the Stewards' Challenge Cup the London Rowing Club defeated the Oxford crew.

AFTER a prolonged enquiry before the coroner for West Surrey and a jury, a verdict has been found in the case of the railway accident at Egham. It will be remembered that on Tuesday, June 7, Ascot races were held, that enormous crowds of people had to be conveyed home to the metropolis from the racecourse within the space of a few hours, and that, through some unfortunate mistake, one train heavily laden had come into collision with another train at Egham Station, killing five persons and wounding about twenty more. The excitement on the subject had been very great, and much anxiety was evinced to learn on whom the blame of the calamity rested. Indeed, it was not a matter of wonder that the public mind should have been affected by the occurrence, for those misfortunes that befall men in the midst of joyful festivities are rendered more painful by the contrast. The jury found the engine-driver and the fireman of the second train guilty of manslaughter in having caused the deaths of the five persons killed, and considered that these men laboured under great disadvantages, owing to the general mismanagement of the railway company, especially in the following particulars:—First, in having no turntable at Ascot, the trains being thereby compelled to return with the tender in front, to the prevention of any communication between the guard and the driver. Secondly, from not using telegraphic communication from station to station. Thirdly, in starting the two trains at only five minutes' interval, and in not instructing the drivers and guards that the first of the two trains would stop at Egham and the second at Staines. The men were admitted to bail.

ON Saturday last a case was called on before Mr. Justice Mellor and a special jury at Westminster, in which one Ruberg was the plaintiff, and Feeny, the publisher of the Birmingham Daily Post, was defendant. The action was for a libel contained in that journal. The defendant pleaded 'Not Guilty,' and the usual editorial plea of the absence of malice and tender of an apology, and also paid five guineas into court. Mr. Bovill for the plaintiff said that the jury would not be troubled with trying the case. The plaintiff three years since had gone to America to attend to the affairs of his brother, an umbrella manufacturer at Birmingham. He proceeded to California, and joined some parties in fitting out a privateer. The Federal Government seized the parties, who were tried, convicted and sentenced to a fine of 10,000 dollars and ten years' imprisonment. The plaintiff, however, at the intercession of Mr. Bright, M.P. for Birmingham, was pardoned. The defendant had published two statements—first, that the plaintiff had been guilty of privateering and ought to have been hanged; second, that he had appropriated money received for his brother. However, the action was only brought to vindicate the character of the plaintiff, and that gentleman would be satisfied with the disavowal of malice on the part of the defendant. It appeared from the statement of defendant's counsel that the plaintiff was still in America. A verdict for the plaintiff with 40*s.* damages was then taken by consent.

IN the case of Yelverton v. Longworth (or Yelverton) in the House of Lords, the arguments on the part of the respondent were concluded on Friday last. Mr. Rolt has the right to reply on behalf of the appellant, Major Yelverton, and in answer to their Lordships intimated that his speech would occupy a whole day. The Lord Chancellor said that the hearing must be adjourned sine die, as there was special business demanding his attention in the House of Lords; but if possible two days' notice should be given of the resumption of the hearing.

WE deeply regret to record that Mr. Washington Wilks, well-known as a prominent member of the Reform Party, and as being connected with our contemporary the Morning Star, was seized with illness whilst addressing a public meeting on Monday the 27th instant, and expired in a few minutes. The melancholy event caused a profound sensation at the meeting, which immediately dispersed. Those most opposed to Mr. Washington Wilks's political views must testify to his many private and public virtues.

THE CONTINENT.

THE CONFERENCE.

A SUMMARY of the deliberations of the Conference of London, from April 25 to June 22, has been drawn up by one of the Plenipotentiaries. The following is an analysis of the document:—

The military position of the respective belligerent powers immediately before the commencement of the Conference was as follows:—Holstein was occupied by the Federal troops, Slesvig and Jutland were in the possession of the Austro-Prussian forces, with the exception of the position of Düppel, the fortress of Fredericia, and the very northern extremity of the peninsula. Düppel, however, was carried, and Fredericia surrendered two days before the opening of the Conference. Conquered at land, Denmark maintained her superiority on the sea, and blockaded the ports and captured the vessels of the German Powers. In retaliation for this the Allies exacted a war contribution of 90,000*l.* from the Danish dominions in their occupation. The Powers represented at the Conference were Austria, Denmark, France, the Germanic Confederation, Prussia, Russia, and Sweden, in conjunction with Great Britain, the convening Power. The first care of the English Plenipotentiaries was to bring about a truce; this was effected, with the assistance of the other neutrals, on May 9, to commence on the 12th and to last for one month. The next step was to arrange a basis for pacification: the representatives of Austria and Prussia were requested to give an account of the conduct and intentions of their respective courts. It then appeared that a very great divergence of opinion existed among the members of the Conference as to the amount of respect to be paid to the Treaty of 1852: the neutral Powers, with Denmark, were content to acknowledge its validity, while the German Powers repudiated it. On May 17, Earl Russell called upon Count Bernstoff to announce his proposed bases of pacification. After some difficulty it was explained that the proposition of the German Powers simply involved the separation of Denmark and the Duchies, leaving the question of succession for future decision. Baron von Beust, however, stated that he was instructed to oppose any reunion of the two under any condition or form. These bases were rejected by Denmark. Thus closes the first chapter of the Conference. On May 28 another proposal was made by the Austro-Prussians, demanding the union of the Duchies in a single State under the Duke of Augustenburg. To this both Russia and Denmark objected, and the scheme was dismissed. Upon this second failure, Lord Russell felt himself justified in taking a more decided step. With the full consent of the neutral Powers, he proposed a compromise, whereby a line should be drawn through Slesvig along the Schlei and the Dannewirke, all to the north of which should be attached to Denmark, while the remainder of Slesvig and the other Duchies should be left to settle upon their own form of government. This proposition was accepted by the belligerents, with reservations on the questions of detail. On June 2, the Russian envoy read a declaration, whereby the Czar of Russia ceded his contingent rights of succession to the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg, with a view to facilitate a pacification between Denmark and Germany. It was now necessary to negotiate for a prolongation of the truce, which ended on June 12; with some difficulty Denmark and the Austro-Prussian allies were induced, the one to grant, and the other to accept, a further suspension of hostilities for a fortnight. The question of most vital interest now was that regarding the frontier line which should divide Slesvig, according to the compromise proposed by Earl Russell. The Danes had agreed to accept the line proposed by England; the Allied Powers settled definitely upon a line drawn from Apenrade to Tondern; between the two lines lay an intermediate territory, with regard to which the neutral Powers were totally unable to induce either the one or the other of the parties to concede a particle. Such was the situation on June 18; a fresh attempt was then made by Lord Russell, who proposed that the decision of the line of demarcation should be settled by the arbitration of a friendly Power. The proposal was referred by the respective envoys to their Governments, and was rejected both by the Allies and by Denmark in the meeting of June 22. The French envoy then made a proposition on behalf of his Government, that a vote of the communes in the northern districts of Slesvig should be taken on the question, free from all pressure from either belligerent. M. de Quaade replied that he must absolutely decline this proposition on behalf of the Danish Government, who could make no concessions beyond the acceptance of the Schlei and Dannewirke frontier line. This sitting practically concluded the Conference; the meeting of the 25th instant was chiefly occupied in the justificatory statements made by the Plenipotentiaries of the belligerent Powers. The Germans refer the failure of negotiations entirely to the obstinacy of Denmark; the Danes refer it to the arbitrary manner in which the Treaty of 1852 had been thrown over. The meeting concluded by a vote of thanks proposed by Baron Apponyi, and presented to Lord Russell, the President of the Conference.

THE WAR.

The conduct of the English Plenipotentiaries in the Conference of London ought materially to reduce the highway rates in a certain place which we know is paved with good intentions. However, the good intentions have been of no avail, and war has recommenced. The game began by a few shots fired upon the isle of Alsen on the morning of the 26th, rather as an inauguration of hostilities than with any definite object. The conditions of the struggle, however, are likely to be materially changed; Austria and Prussia will, it is said, invite the Germanic Confederation to declare war against Denmark. On the other hand, Russia will send a fleet of observation into the south of the Baltic; and even England has declared, if at least German newspapers are to be believed, that she will not suffer any occupation of the island possessions of Denmark. Fourteen Danish men-of-war are cruising round the scene of operations; while the Austro-Prussian squadron is increased by a Monitor armed with Armstrong guns, and two iron-cased corvettes. The city of Hamburg has also bought some ships, which she purposes to place at the disposal of Prussia; and the squadron under Admiral Wullerstorff is also to be increased. Orders have been sent to the Allied forces to continue their advance into Jutland, and transports have been sent in pieces overland to convey troops to Alsen. The Danish military force is calculated at about 35,000 men, that of the Allies at 60,000; but the latter number will, of course, be largely augmented should the army of occupation in Holstein take the aggressive, as is suggested by the invitation of the Allies to the Confederation.

By Reuter's telegrams of June 29, we learn that on that morning eleven battalions of the Prussian army crossed the Alsen Sound, north of Sönderborg, at daybreak. The Danish troops were beaten back with the loss of several guns, and embarked in great haste. The Prussian loss was moderate. The attack of the Rolf Krake was repulsed by the Prussian batteries. The number of Prussian battalions engaged was eleven, forming a force of about 10,000 men. The number of Danish troops on the island of Alsen is stated to have been about 8,000.

DENMARK.

The Rigsrad was opened at Copenhagen on Saturday, the 25th inst. A royal message was delivered to the Representatives by Bishop Monrad, explaining that the authority of that assembly was necessary to enable the Government to raise the requisite revenue. The message concluded with a prayer that the nation which so earnestly sympathises with the Danes, may be led to convert her sympathy into active assistance. We need not say that the nation so alluded to is England.

The Russian proposition brought by Baron von Plessen was rejected by the Danish Government after some lively discussion. The King was inclined to accept it, but appears to have been convinced by Bishop Monrad that his acceptance of it would probably cost him his crown. The proposal involved, it is supposed, a scheme for the personal union of Denmark and the Duchies, a scheme no less unpopular in Denmark than in Germany itself.

GERMANY.

The Prussians have made an unsuccessful attempt to found a military post at the mouth of the Jahde in the Duchy of Oldenburg, which would be a basis of operations in the North Sea. The works were in the process of construction, when an unusually high tide came up and swamped everything, works, docks, and Prussian aspirations.

We have to chronicle the death of William I., king of Wurtemburg, which took place at Stuttgardt on the morning of the 25th instant. The deceased monarch was the oldest of the sovereigns of Europe, having been born in 1781. His father was Duke of Wurtemburg, a near relation of Frederick the Great, in whose court he was brought up; his mother was a Princess of Brunswick. The Duke of Wurtemburg was made an Elector of the Empire as reconstituted by Napoleon, and was afterwards raised by the same hand to the dignity of the kingly title. The late King, then Prince Royal of Wurtemburg, accompanied Napoleon on his Russian expedition, but was not so wedded to his cause as to forbear from entering France with the invading army of Germans and Russians in 1814. He was connected with Napoleon by marriage, his sister having married Jerome, King of Westphalia, father of the present Prince Jerome. In 1818 he succeeded to the throne of Wurtemburg on the death of his father, and reigned without interruption for the space of forty-six years. Born under the last rays of the great Imperial monarchy, which Napoleon was afterwards utterly to extinguish—brought up amid the wild tales of the French Revolution—matured in the wars of Napoleon—William I. of Wurtemburg had learned a lesson of which he readily availed himself on his accession to the throne. His rule was equitable and beneficial to his subjects; they enjoyed a good constitution and perfect religious liberty. Where it was so easy to have been very bad, we must give the deceased king all praise that he was reasonably good. He is succeeded by Prince Charles Frederick Alexander, his son, who was born in 1823, and married in 1846 the Grand Duchess Olga, daughter of the Czar Nicholas.

The meeting of the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia at Carlsbad was chiefly noticeable from the rumours of a renewal of understanding between the two German Powers, consequent on the meeting of the two Foreign Ministers, Herren von Rechberg and Bismarck. It was immediately after the conference between the two diplomats that it was announced that the Germanic Confederation was to be invited to declare war against Denmark. On the 23rd inst. the Emperor left Carlsbad for Prague, after having presented Herr von Bismarck with the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stephen.

A quaint account is given of the imperial réunion at the baths of Kissingen. Emperors, kings, princes, grand dukes, and so on, are as plentiful as strawberries; the diplomatic circle is as distinguished as that which has just ceased to meet in London. Princes, counts, barons, generals, and presidents are to be counted by hundreds; the air is alive with titles. Luckily the etiquette is to appear only in plain clothes, and without any orders or decorations. The Emperor of Russia is supposed to be quite incognito, travelling under the style of Count Borodinski. Under these circumstances, it behoves the smaller world to walk circumspectly, as they may at any moment tread on the toes of a monarch or jostle a princess unwittingly.

THE DUCHIES.

The Duke of Augustenburg has paid a visit to the western side of the territories which he claims, and has been received with enthusiasm. The manners of the Duchies are sufficiently like the English to warrant them in giving him a dinner, and exacting from him a speech afterwards: in this speech he told them that he gloried in the title of first German Duke of Slesvig-Holstein—that he had no intention of bending himself to the service of any particular interests, and was ready to make all sacrifices necessary for the safety of Germany. The claims made by the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg, as nominee of Russia to the sovereignty of the Duchies, excite the liveliest and sometimes the most painful interest in Germany. There is no doubt that the feeling in the Duchies in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg is of a very personal nature, and that persons who once clamoured for him as the representative of a principle are now equally clamorous against another Prince who is as good and perhaps a better representative of the same principle. The two aspirants embody to a great extent the leanings of the two great German Powers; Prussia inclining to Oldenburg, partly from pique at the refusal of the Duke of Augustenburg to surrender Kiel as a Federal fortress, partly from a regard for the wishes of the Czar of Russia: Austria preferring Augustenburg, for the very simple reason that Prussia objects to him. The Norddeutsche Zeitung has a paragraph in a conspicuous place relating that the Duke of Augustenburg has declared, 'that it would have been better for himself and his cause if Prussia had never meddled at all in the affairs of Slesvig-Holstein.'

The central committee of the Duchies has informed Herr von Beust that 240 of their local committees have protested against the arbitrary division of Slesvig. The sentiment has been re-echoed in the Chamber of Deputies of Saxony, who go so far as to assert that the union of Slesvig and Holstein is unalterable—a sort of law of the Medes and Persians, which cannot be broken. They certainly had the art of making their treaties like their cement in olden times of a much more durable nature than at present. Why is a treaty four hundred years old, uniting Slesvig and Holstein, so much more binding than one twelve years old uniting Slesvig-Holstein and Denmark?

FRANCE.

The Magenta, Couronne, and Normandie, ironclad frigates, are now being armed on a new system, combining great artillery power with exceeding solidity. They will carry a broadside of rifled 68-pounders, and four 110-pounders as bow and stern chasers, besides four mortars of the nominal calibre of 170 lbs. on their upper deck. These vessels will, when completely equipped, form a squadron commanded by a rear-admiral.

Divers gangs of swindlers have for a long time preyed on the credulity of the French public from the safe distance of the British Islands. Not long ago the departments were inundated with letters from a firm at Liverpool stating that they had received from America a packet of deeds and testamentary papers, addressed to their correspondent, which they would forward to him on receipt of stamps to the amount of 9 francs 80 cents. for expenses of carriage. Now a new 'dodge' has come into vogue, which displays consummate ability, knowledge of business, and of human nature. A Frenchman receives a letter from 'Z. Vermesch & Co., 4 Clement's Inn, Strand,' stating that an aunt or other relation lately deceased was insured in their office for a certain sum; but that a stipulation had been inserted in her policy that the annual premium should be paid within a fortnight of its becoming due. The company hearing of the lady's death now write to the next of kin, to acknowledge their liability, but to inform him also that the premium of, say, 100 fr., had fallen due immediately before her decease, and that if it were not paid within the fortnight according to the stipulations, the policy would be void. The delighted bourgeois is determined not to lose a probably large sum for the want of 100 fr., and despatches the money straight to England. Of course nothing more is heard of Z. Vermesch and Co., and enquiries at the address given only elicit the fact that a foreign gentleman had lately engaged a small room there, in which he conducted a large correspondence, but that nothing is now known of him.

A new sort of drill has been invented in the French army for drivers of wagons and artillery. They are taught to form their wagons into battalion order, to march in column, to wheel, &c., at the word of command. A narrow lane is also formed with caissons and other heavy objects, through which the drivers have to pass at a walk and at the trot, and also to back their horses along the whole length of it. At the general annual inspection, the lane is formed of two lines of skittle-pins, with only sufficient space between them for the passage of a carriage. The number of pins knocked down by each driver in the course of his evolutions is counted, and a prize given to the one who knocks down the fewest.

The little comedy of which we proceed to give an account was acted lately at Tours, and is of a nature to puzzle somewhat the international lawyers. A Mexican prisoner of war, residing in that town, named Manuel Reyero, succeeded in gaining the affections of the daughter of his host. He contemplated marriage, but before the ceremony could be performed two steps were required: he must produce his certificate of birth, and receive the authorisation of the Minister of War. The first requirement was, he contended, impossible, considering the state of affairs in Mexico and his own inability to state where the certificate could be found: the place of it was therefore supplied by a declaration made by seven of his fellow-prisoners who were acquainted with him. Nothing was then required but the leave of the Minister of War. To his repeated applications no immediate answer was given, and the bridegroom becoming impatient determined to do without it, and persuaded a too credulous mayor to perform the ceremony of marriage. But in the meantime the Minister of War had not been idle: only, instead of taking Señor Reyero's word, he had written to Mexico for the certificate of birth. Shortly after the marriage the certificate arrived, and with it, to the utter disgust of the unhappy Mexican, two other documents which he had not required. The first was a certificate of his marriage in 1832: the second a declaration that his first wife was still alive. An explanation was of course immediately called for. Reyero said in his defence that he had married at the age of seventeen on the compulsion of his father: that he had never allowed the validity of the act, although he had lived with the lady for eighteen years, and had three married daughters. He had never himself signed the marriage contract, and had separated from his wife in 1850 on the understanding that he was at liberty to form a fresh union. A court-martial is sitting to decide on the best course to be pursued. It is a question whether to judge of the validity of the marriage on general canon law, which military men can know little about, or to plunge into the mysteries of the Mexican marriage law to discover whether a union lasting for eighteen years was sufficient ratification of a marriage imperfectly performed.

SWEDEN.

Some excitement was caused at Stockholm by the publication of a letter from the King of Sweden to the King of Denmark, proposing a Scandinavian union and an eventual fusion of the two dynasties. A Cabinet Council was held on the subject: and finally the King ordered the publication of a Ministerial note, disavowing the letter to a certain extent, and saying that the Swedish Government will continue to act in the most disinterested manner with regard to the Dano-German conflict.

The Swedish fleet has separated. Part of it has gone to Stockholm, and part to Christiania in Norway.

ITALY.

The same subject has occupied the attention of the Chamber of Deputies at Turin, upon a question put by Signor Siccoli, whether the Italian Government had taken measures for the protection of a colony of 10,000 Italians who now inhabit Lima, and whether they would not favour the side of the American Republics rather than that of Spain. Signor Visconti Venosta, the Foreign Minister, in reply said: 'Spain is not our enemy; we are two nations, sons of the same mother, united and assimilated by innumerable points of affinity.' However, a squadron is to be sent to the Pacific, and the diplomatic staff of consular and other representatives in those countries will be filled up as speedily as possible.

The National Rifle Meeting of Italy, which last year held a very successful meeting at Turin, was opened this year at Milan, on the 19th inst., by Prince Humbert with great pomp. It was attended by a deputation of 400 Swiss riflemen, who were greeted most enthusiastically on their arrival by the authorities and people of Milan. Rifle-shooting is taking deep root in some parts of Italy. It is conducted on principles very different from ours, and they are not often careful to attain the length of range which is thought necessary by us. The butts at Florence are perfect marvels of luxury, every distance being provided with its own target, from the shortest pistol range to the half-mile of the Whitworth. In consequence of this luxuriance of targets, the various classes can stand next to one another and fire at the same moment. A large and airy building protects all alike either from the fierce rays of the sun or the no less unpleasant though less frequent drenching of an Italian storm.

GREECE.

A despatch from Corfu announces that the King of the Hellenes has left the Ionian Islands, accompanied by M. Amelot, Prince Gagarine, and Mr. Rumbold, the diplomatic agents for France, Russia, and England, who have not ceased to follow him since the beginning of his journey.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

The meeting of the Sultan and Prince Alexander-John, better known to the world as Prince Couza, has been productive of the happiest results. The explanations and concessions made mutually have been satisfactory as well to the parties concerned as to the congress of plenipotentiaries at Constantinople. Some trifling difficulty occurred with regard to his intercourse with the diplomatic body, in consequence of an invitation addressed to him by M. de Moustier, the French ambassador; the rule apparently is that the first official recognition of his presence should have been made by the senior member of the diplomatic body, who happens to be the English Ambassador, Sir Henry Bulwer. However, the difficulty appears to have arisen rather on a matter of etiquette than of political significance, and was speedily solved by explanations. England and France appear to vie with one another in claiming the credit of a pacific solution of the Principality question; for aught we know, Austria may also have a claim to the honour.

SPAIN.

A statement has been made in the Spanish Cortes by the Foreign Minister, Señor Pacheco, with regard to the Peruvian difficulty, whereof we subjoin a summary. He said that in spite of the old family connection between Spain and Peru, the latter power had made a point of treating Spaniards with exceptional harshness. The present difficulties had first arisen in consequence of an attack made by banditti upon a Spanish colony at Talambo, in which some of the colonists were killed and wounded. A request was made that the laws should be enforced, but the local tribunals proceeded with so marked an apathy and unwillingness, that the Spanish Government sent Señor Salazar y Mazarredo, with the title of Special Commissioner Extraordinary, to urge the claims of justice. The Peruvian Ministry began by putting him off, on the pretext that no business could be done during Holy Week; they next objected to receive him under the title given him by his Government, and in short showed so plainly their determination to put every impediment in the way of negotiation, that Señor Salazar thought it inconsistent with his dignity to remain in the country. He then concerted measures for putting a pressure on Peru, with Señor Pinzon, the commandant of the Spanish squadron; the result of which was the occupation of the Chincha islands by the latter gentleman. This action the Home Government could not approve; still less could they approve the statement which accompanied the occupation of the islands, wherein a sort of claim was set up on behalf of Spain to the possession of them. However, the Spanish Government cannot now release the islands until negotiations with Peru are satisfactorily terminated; but they wish it to be well understood that they hold them not as claiming a right to them, but as part of a foreign territory held in guarantee. It was hoped that matters could be easily settled since both Spain and Peru were willing to make concessions; unfortunately, however, Señor Salazar during his journey home was the object of a series of attacks (of which we gave an account in our last number) which imperatively required an explanation from the Peruvian Government. The Spanish Ministry did not pretend to say that the attempts to assassinate their Commissioner were ordered or even connived at by the Peruvians, but they felt that it was necessary for that Government immediately and absolutely to repudiate all connection with them, before any further steps could be taken towards reconciliation. When that was once explained he had little doubt that the remaining difficulties might be easily arranged.

JAPAN.

The treaty between the Emperor of the French and the Tycoon of Japan lately concluded in Paris contains the following articles:—1. In reparation of the act of hostility committed by firing upon the French ship Kien-Cheng, an indemnity of 140,000 Mexican piastres shall be paid (about 30,000*l.*) 2. All impediments in the way of French commerce shall be removed in the straits of Fimonosaki. 3. The reduction of custom-dues lately granted to foreign shipping shall be accorded also to French merchants. All articles connected with the preparation and packing of teas shall be admitted duty-free; a duty of 5 per cent. only shall be charged on wines, spirits, sugar, pig or manufactured iron, cloths, watches, and medicines; a duty of 6 per cent. on mirrors, china, jewellery, arms, and paper. 4. This arrangement shall be considered as an integral part of the treaty of October 9, 1858. In addition to these articles, the Japanese authorities have paid an indemnity of 35,000 dollars to the family of Lieutenant Camus, and agree to use all steps to bring his murderers to justice. By despatches from Japan, dated April 25, we learn that an important revolution is being effected in that country. The Tycoon has made an arrangement with the spiritual sovereign, the Mikado, whereby the former will become real monarch of Japan, consolidating the executive power, and lessening the overweening authority of the Daimios. Many of the former ministers have been dismissed, and the chief of the late embassy to France has been named as first minister. The Tycoon intends to introduce gas and the electric telegraph into Japan, to build a steam fleet, and to adopt a general system of Western improvements.

MEXICO.

The Emperor Maximilian of Mexico arrived at Vera Cruz on the morning of the 28th ult., after having touched at Madeira and Martinique. In the latter island he found certain Mexicans who had been condemned by Marshal Forey to penal servitude for various reasons. Four of these he brought with him to Mexico, eight were liberated, and among the rest 2,000 francs were distributed, and a promise given that they should not be forgotten. On the 29th, the Emperor and Empress landed amid the thunder of a salute of 101 guns from the Novara, responded to by the cannon of the forts. They went straight to the railway station, whence a special train bore them to Loma-Alto, the last station on the line; they then went on by carriage to Cordova, where they slept, and on the next day proceeded to Orizaba, where they publicly returned thanks in the parish church for the safe conclusion of their journey. The arrival of their majesties has been greeted by a series of victories gained by the Franco-Mexican forces. On May 17, Doblado was completely beaten by Mejia with the loss of 1,200 prisoners, and 17 guns, besides provision trains, arms and ammunition. On the 13th, General Douai encountered a Juarist band, and dispersed them after an hour's fighting; the enemy lost 200 killed, 100 prisoners, 150 horses, and 4 guns. General Douai lost 4 killed, and 20 wounded. At Valparaiso, another engagement took place between the French and the Juarists, in which the latter lost 420 killed and prisoners, 8 guns, 500 muskets, and 200 horses.

The French military authorities speak with great satisfaction of the capabilities of the Mexican horses for purposes of war. Those of the northern provinces, Guadalajara, Zacatecas, &c., are large and stout, and well adapted for general cavalry. Those of the provinces of Puebla and Orizaba are small and very active, and singularly suited for real light cavalry purposes. Both breeds are hardy, and require little attention.

The Mexicans are extremely well satisfied with the success of their attempts to create a cotton market in their country. A letter from Chihuahua states that the last crop was so good, and fetched so high a price, that all the land in that part of the country is now devoted to the growth of cotton. They hope soon to rival in that industry the richest provinces of Texas. The last crop realised 30 piastres (6*l.* 8*s.*) a quintal on the spot, and was bought up in advance by eager speculators from Matamoros. The Indians are being exterminated in that country, a circumstance which will conduce materially to its prosperity. For the edification of those of our readers who may not be conversant with the geography of Mexico, we may observe that Chihuahua is a province on the south-west of Texas, lying between the frontier Rio Grande del Norte and the Sierra Verde; it is watered by the Chonchos, a tributary of the Rio Grande, and thus is in easy communication with Matamoros and the Gulf of Mexico.

PERSIA.

Disturbances have arisen in the province of Asterabad on the Eastern coasts of the Caspian Sea, in consequence of the incursions of the Turcoman tribes. These tribes, in nominal dependence on the Shah of Persia, have been very irregular lately in the payment of their contributions, and have gone so far as to carry off certain subjects of Persia. Three regiments have already been sent to guard the frontier, and now a force of about 25,000 men has been despatched, with artillery and cavalry, to restore permanent order among these nomad tribes. The arrangements have been skilfully made to surround them before the close of their harvest, after which time they would retire into their inaccessible deserts; an electric telegraph is being laid from Teheran to Asterabad, and stores of provisions have been sent forward for the use of the troops.

THE LOSSES OF THE FEDERAL NAVY.—The Constitutionnel, in commenting upon the late action between the Kearsage and the Alabama, spoke with admiration of the noble career of the latter vessel during the past two years. Upon this the Siècle retorted that the career of the Alabama had consisted of the ensnaring of merchantmen, and the destruction of their cargoes whenever a safe market for the sale of them did not present itself; and 'what,' it asks, 'was there so very noble in this?' Upon this sarcasm the Pays replies that the Siècle was either wilfully mistaken, or singularly prejudiced. The Alabama has never avoided an engagement with a man-of-war on reasonable terms; on January 17, 1863, she attacked and sank the Hatteras, 11 guns, in the midst of the squadron blockading Galveston, after a fight of twenty minutes, and took her officers and crew prisoners. The charge made against the Confederate navy that they are mere corsairs preying on a helpless commerce is an imposition on the credulity of the public. In spite of the numerical weakness of the Confederate navy, it has, by dint of activity, energy, and patriotism, effected great things. No better proof can be given of the fact than the subjoined imperfect list of Federal men-of-war destroyed or captured by it in less than three years. Cumberland, frigate, 50; Constitution, frigate, 32; Mercedita, corvette, 12; Keokuk, iron monitor, 8; Gilcs, gunboat, 8; Kinsman, gunboat, 3; Columbia, corvette, 10; Mississippi, frigate, 30; Annie Bonsall, transport, 3; Lancaster, iron corvette, 12; Diana, iron corvette, 7; Washington, gunboat, 5; Barrataria, gunboat, 6; Pribble, corvette, 11; Cincinnati, corvette, 13; Harriet Lane, gunboat, 7; Westfield, gunboat, 10; Hatteras, corvette, 11; Lidell, gunboat, 9; Winona, gunboat, 10; Queen of the West, iron steamer, 10; De Soto, gunboat, 6; Indianola, iron steamer, 3; *J. The theatres in Richmond have been closed, the public not choosing to frequent them, 'in view of the bloody drama now being played' so near the city. The Richmond Examiner announces that a majority of the male actors are in the ranks.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE UNITED STATES AND BRITISH SHIPPING.

On Monday, Mr. Cave called attention to a subject of considerable importance to a branch of colonial trade—that, namely, between New York and Jamaica. A New York firm, Messrs. Cordova & Co., had been in the habit for a considerable time of shipping provisions to Messrs. Levy & Co., a mercantile house in Jamaica, to the extent of 100,000*l.* a year. These provisions were disposed of by Messrs. Levy in the ordinary course of business in Jamaica. These gentlemen had informed him (Mr. Cave) that they had no trade whatever with the Southern States, and it was, of course, extremely unlikely that they would ship contraband of war from the port of New York. The trade, in fact, was of the most legitimate and ordinary character. However, a short time ago, Mr. Levy, the head of the Jamaica firm and a member of the House of Assembly in that island, now in England, received a letter from his New York correspondent, dated May 28, informing him that the ship Leonard Berry, consigned to his firm, together with the Perilia, another ship loaded for the same destination, and all other vessels clearing for Jamaica, had been stopped by the Collector of Customs under a regulation requiring captains and shippers to furnish bonds to the United States that the cargoes were intended for the consumption of Jamaica, and would never be used for the benefit of the Confederate States; that three bonds were required, with sureties qualifying in real estate to the amount of twice the value of the cargo, or in the case of the Leonard Berry to $100,000, or in round figures 20,000*l.*, and that there was no provision for cancelling these bonds, even upon the certificate of the United States Consul in Jamaica that the cargo had been landed, but the bonds were to insure to all time, subject to the production of some evidence which might lead to their forfeiture. The writer probably did not exaggerate when he called this an embargo on Jamaica ships; and it must be a prohibition to the trade, as no trade could exist under such restrictions. It seemed that a trade in bonds had, however, sprung up under this regulation, and that people were willing to run the risk of being sureties at a price of 2½ per cent on the value of the cargo. The same regulations applied to Nassau, Bermuda, and Matamoros with more reason, perhaps, because those places had notoriously imported far more than their population warranted, but still contrary to international law, or at any rate the comity of nations. Jamaica, however, had a population of 400,000 to be supplied, and had always carried on a considerable trade with New York. Similar restrictions had been placed on the trade to Halifax, and St. John, New Brunswick, but they had been removed, as contrary to the Reciprocity Treaty. They had also been applied to Havannah, but had likewise been withdrawn on the Captain-General of Cuba threatening that he would refuse clearances to American vessels in every port of Cuba. In this case the British Consul tried in vain to obtain a relaxation of the rule, and an appeal had been made to Lord Lyons. Since the letter of May 28 was written intelligence had arrived that in this special case the security of the shippers had been received, and so the 2½ per cent. payment had been saved, but the regulations remained unchanged. He (Mr. Cave) had no sympathy with those who, in defiance of the Queen's proclamation, supplied munitions of war to either belligerent. Those who carried contraband of war must also run their chance, but it seemed unjust that fair traders should be subject to these arbitrary restrictions, and certainly unworthy and impolitic in the British Government to submit to them. The letter to which he had referred stated that our quiet submission to such arbitrary conduct had excited anything but respect on the other side of the Atlantic. He therefore wished to know whether any information on this subject had been received from Lord Lyons, and whether instructions had been sent, or, if not, whether they would be sent to him to protest against a system so injurious to an important branch of our colonial commerce.

Mr. Layard said the subject had given considerable trouble to Her Majesty's Government and to Lord Lyons. He was not aware that the particular case described had been reported to the Government; but Lord Lyons had informed them that those restrictions had been imposed upon vessels going to Jamaica and the West Indies. The opinion of the law officers of the Crown had been taken on the subject, and it was to the effect that the restrictions were illegal and vexatious. As for requiring that goods which had been landed at a neutral port should never find their way to the Confederate States, there was no doubt that those terms were altogether beyond the competence of the United States Government to impose, and in consequence of the representations of Her Majesty's Government those restrictions had in many cases been removed. One or two of those cases were now under the consideration of the law officers of the Crown, and instructions would be sent to Lord Lyons to make strong representations to the United States Government on the subject.

THE KEARSAGE.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Lord C. Paget said, in reply to Mr. Corry, that it was unnecessary to send to Cherbourg to learn how the sides of the Kearsage were strengthened against shot and shell as described by Captain Semmes, since the Kearsage had been in dock in this country, and the Government were already in possession of the required information.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Monday, both Houses of Parliament were crowded by eager and excited audiences anxious to hear the Ministerial announcements in reference to the Danish question. In the Lords the Prince of Wales took his seat on the cross benches, and the Princess of Wales was present as a spectator.

As we give in our notes on events of the week a summary of the proceedings of the Conference, a brief report of the Parliamentary proceedings of Monday will be sufficient, particularly in view of the debate that is to take place next week.

Earl Russell, in the Lords, after reviewing the proceedings of the Conference, argued that England had given no guarantee to Denmark, and that England was not bound alone to maintain inviolate the integrity of the Danish monarchy. The strength of England was necessary to preserve other interests than those of the balance of power in Europe, and we might be called upon to defend our rights in other quarters of the globe. His Lordship said: 'It is no longer a question with reference to the balance of power in Europe. There are other parts of the world in which our interests may be as deeply involved, and in which we may have, some day or other, to maintain the honour and interests of this country. The civil war now raging in America, ending how it may, whether by the establishment of an independent republic in the South, or whether it ends, most unexpectedly as it would be to me, I confess, by restoring the Union, still the United States of America, or the Northern States, or whatever they may be called, will then be in a totally different position to that which they were in a few years ago. A great army will then be maintained by the United States. A formidable navy will also be kept up. Our relations with that Power are liable at any moment to interruption. I hope and trust that our friendly relations may be maintained; still, those relations must be considered and kept in view as well as our interest in the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe.' If the war should assume a new character, if for example the Germans should attack Copenhagen, the Government might arrive at a different decision, and in that case Parliament would be consulted. The present policy was to maintain peace, and in striving to effect this object, the Government had preserved the honour of the country.

In the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston gave a résumé of the Danish question and a history of the Conference. His Lordship said the Government are of opinion that might had overridden right, and they should have been glad to have taken the part of Denmark if they could have done so justly; but the Danes had been originally in the wrong, the matter in dispute was small, and France and Russia had declined to take any part in giving material support to Denmark. Therefore the Government had not seen any reason to depart from their pacific policy. If, however, the character of the war changed, and the independence of Denmark was threatened, the position of this country would be reconsidered, and if there should be any change in the policy of the Government, it would be communicated to Parliament.

Mr. Disraeli gave notice on Tuesday that he would on Monday next move the following vote of censure: 'To move a humble address to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for directing the correspondence on Denmark and Germany and the protocols of the Conference recently held in London to be laid before Parliament. To assure Her Majesty that we have heard with deep concern that the sittings of that Conference have been brought to a close without accomplishing the important purposes for which it was convened. To express to Her Majesty our great regret that, while the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government has failed to maintain their avowed policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, it has lowered the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace.'

Mr. Kinglake gave notice that he proposed to move an amendment to the motion of which notice had just been given. The words he should state to-morrow.

RELIGION IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.—The Charleston Courier of May 14 says: 'Up to the beginning of the active movements, the results of which are now anxiously but hopefully expected, the reports of chaplains and missionaries and visitors showed a general and actively increasing interest in religion as prevailing in both of our main armies. The course of this war will show what has never been so fully exhibited in any army, that a soldier who fears and honours God, and is not ashamed to be ashamed or afraid of blasphemy, profanity, licentiousness, and pillage, is none the less terrible to the enemy.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the south, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

Grant's New Plan of Campaign.

AT length we know something decisive of GRANT's movements. It is reported officially that his whole force had crossed the James River, and was moving along the south bank on Richmond. SMITH's corps of 15,000 men had already attacked and taken the outer defences of Petersburg, and a rumour was afloat that the town itself had fallen. This is far from improbable. The line of the Appomattox and the city of Petersburg were not tenable whilst the Federals possessed any considerable force at Bermuda Hundreds. So long as BUTLER could be kept within his intrenchments, the Confederates could make a show of resistance. But the arrival of GRANT's whole army on the south bank entirely changed the aspect of the affair. A column pushed forward from Bermuda Hundreds would take the force defending the line of the Appomattox in the rear, and compel it, if successfully attacked in front, to fall back westward, and make a long détour in order to regain Richmond. It is probable, therefore, that, as soon as the attack upon Petersburg was found to be serious, the whole Confederate garrison was withdrawn at once in the direction of Richmond, or only allowed to remain long enough to ensure the safe transport of such supplies as it was expedient to carry off to Richmond. The fighting is not likely to have been very obstinate. The town of Petersburg is about thirty miles from Richmond. Bermuda Hundreds is some ten miles nearer. Supposing it to be GRANT's intention to move directly upon Richmond, he will take the line of the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad; and he has at any rate secured this advantage, that he has interrupted one line of LEE's communications with the South. But here, as in the northern and eastern routes to Richmond, strong fortifications await him; and chief of these is Fort Darling, the works of which cover equally the James River and the line of railroad. To advance upon Richmond with any hope of success, he must first capture the Confederate position at Drury's Bluff; and, as the garrison of Fort Darling is in uninterrupted communication with Richmond, and supported by a very powerful ironclad flotilla, a coup de main is out of the question, and regular siege operations must be resorted to. It might, it is true, be possible for GRANT's army to march past these works, leaving a sufficient force to hold in check the Confederate garrison. But this would be a very hazardous operation, for Fort Darling could be reinforced at will by the Confederates, and a sortie in large numbers might imperil the very existence of GRANT's army. The position at Drury's Bluff, then, must be assaulted and taken before Richmond is in danger, and, from all we can hear, Drury's Bluff is likely to give GRANT as much trouble as Vicksburg. It remains to be seen, however, whether the Federals are strong enough to spread over the country south of Richmond, and destroy LEE's communications with the South. At Petersburg they are in dangerous proximity to the Danville line of railroad, and a dashing cavalry leader ought to render that line almost useless to the Confederates. In that case, the only road open would be the Virginia Central, which is alleged to be threatened by General HUNTER, and if GRANT should be able to maintain his position south of Richmond through the summer and autumn months, LEE would inevitably run short of supplies. But we can hardly suppose that GRANT contemplates such a lengthened stay before Richmond, or that, with Washington open to a Confederate incursion, he will move very far from his gunboats on the James. Nor is it likely that LEE will remain inactive. The force of ironclads at Richmond is known to be powerful, and if a naval battle should place the James River in the hands of the Confederates, GRANT's army would never get back to the North. The defences of the south of Richmond are immensely strong, and to capture the town he must once more cross the James in the teeth of an army nearly equal in numbers. LEE has the opportunity of striking a crushing blow at General HUNTER's force, or of pushing northward boldly into the enemy's territory. In either case, GRANT could not long maintain his position south of Richmond.

Beyond this new movement of the Army of the Potomac, there is nothing of great importance in the military news of the past week. SHERIDAN's cavalry force, on which great expectations were fixed, has been defeated, but we have only the bare announcement of the fact, and we are left in ignorance as to the locality of the defeat and the objects of the expedition. If he was really attempting to join HUNTER, the check is a very serious one to the Federals; but it would be premature for the present to speculate on its results. Of greater moment, perhaps, is the defeat of General STURGIS by FORREST's cavalry in Tennessee, with the loss of all his artillery trains, &c., and the destruction of his army. We are inclined to believe that STURGIS was not so much in pursuit of FORREST, as en route for SHERMAN's communications with reinforcements and supplies, and that FORREST's object was to intercept his march. FORREST is now supreme in that quarter; and as he is reported to be making for SHERMAN's rear, his movements may prove most calamitous for the Federal army in Georgia. By the latest accounts from this State, SHERMAN's lines were within 500 yards of the Confederate army under JOHNSTON, who had taken up a very strong position on the hills in front of Marietta, and the Federal army was intrenching itself. There were no further flank movements to be made. SHERMAN had either to fight, and assault a very strong position, or retreat. Any day may bring us the news that the decisive battle has been fought. But it must be remembered that JOHNSTON, if he loses, has Atlanta, a fortified town, to fall back upon; SHERMAN has 140 miles of an enemy's country to travel in order to reach Chattanooga; and if FORREST once reaches his communications, it is difficult to see how he can escape a great disaster. Both sides are bringing up reinforcements. General TAYLOR, with 16,000 men from Louisiana, was reported to be on his way to join JOHNSTON. When the day of battle comes, we expect it will be found that even the numerical superiority in which the Federals have so long trusted will have failed them.

For the moment, however, all the interest of the war is centred in the struggle for Richmond. The defeat of SHERMAN, involving, as it probably would, the loss of the whole of Tennessee, would be made light of in the North, if GRANT maintained his position before the Confederate capital; and it is to Virginia that all the energies and resources of the North will be directed. Hitherto all have failed. GRANT is now in a worse position than at any former period. It was always open to him to have occupied Petersburg. His flotilla and 50,000 men would have enabled him to seize it almost without a struggle. As it is, he has sacrificed 70,000 men, the flower of his army, in reaching a town which he might have occupied almost by a demonstration three months ago. What is more, he has given the Confederates what they most wanted—time. Reinforcements have now reached LEE, and are reaching him, from all parts of the Confederacy, whilst GRANT to his casualties in the field has now to add the losses by withdrawal of the three years' service men. By a legal quibble, and by threats of extermination, he was enabled to retain these men for two months beyond their time of service. But the bulk of them are now on the point of leaving the army of the Potomac, or have left it; and GRANT will not find efficient substitutes for them in the badly-equipped and undrilled recruits now hurried off by Mr. STANTON to fill up his ranks. The struggle may yet be long and bloody; the repulses of Spottsylvania and the Chickahominy may have to be repeated on the banks of the James River. But GRANT's campaign failed, when BUTLER was driven to his gunboats, SIGEL defeated, and his main army driven back with slaughter from Spottsylvania. We must leave to Federal sympathisers to estimate the remote chances of his success now that all his hopes rest on the possibility of a victorious advance along the south bank of the James River.

The Conference.

THE attention of Parliament for some weeks past has been directed with increasing earnestness and concentration upon one object—the Danish war and the London Conference. Question after question was put to the Ministry, during the sitting of the Conference, to elicit information in regard to its proceedings; and over and over again Lord PALMERSTON in one House, and Lord RUSSELL in the other, returned the same reply. The Plenipotentiaries assembled had agreed from the first that no intimation of what passed in their deliberations should be given to the public until the discussion was over and the Conference finally adjourned, and that pledge the Ministers of the QUEEN were not at liberty to break. To press questions, in the face of an answer of this kind, was of course impossible; but the frequency with which questions were asked, and the manifest discontent with which the barren reply was endured, evinced a very different spirit from that which Parliament usually displays when 'the interest of the public service' requires that the conduct of HER MAJESTY'S Government should be shrouded in mystery. The impatient feeling displayed may be readily explained. In the first place, one of the Governments represented at the Conference has from the first, in an underhand manner, disregarded its solemn engagements; and the German press has conveyed to this country intimations of what has been passing in London which were not a little alarming to the pride as well as to the prudence of England. It was very difficult for the House of Commons to recognise a reserve which was observed only against the British Parliament, or to admit that it must remain in official ignorance of matters which Prussian journals were allowed to publish to the world at large. When informed first that England had submitted to the repudiation of the treaty of 1852 and the spoliation of Denmark; then that the line of the Schlei had been proposed as her boundary; then that there was a question of giving up this, the northernmost line that would give her a single position in which a battle could be fought for the protection of Jutland; then that Denmark had sent in an ultimatum, so much distrusting her allies that she would rather risk the chances of war than those of further negotiation; then that Prussia had threatened to repudiate the treaty of Paris, and resort to privateering—it was not wonderful that the representatives of the English people grew impatient of a silence which partook rather of Japanese etiquette than of diplomatic prudence, and only affected to conceal matters which were already notorious everywhere, save within the walls of Parliament. It needed all Lord PALMERSTON'S tact and influence to curb that impatience, and persuade the House that it was one thing for the Prussian or the Federal representative to send secret telegrams to German editors, and quite another for a British Minister to give to those telegrams an authoritative affirmation from his place on the Treasury Bench. Nor did the questions finally cease till the First Minister announced, on Thursday last, that the Conference would probably meet for the last time on Saturday, and that on Monday the House should be fully informed of all that had passed.

Another feeling, no doubt, contributed to the tone of excitement and uneasiness that pervaded the House of Commons. There was a total uncertainty as to the policy of the Government, a want of confidence in their intentions, and a grave suspicion that they themselves were rather drifting in search of an anchorage than pursuing a consistent course towards any predetermined haven. And there can be little doubt that this suspicion was well founded. The conduct of the Ministry from first to last indicates that they were afflicted by that surest source of indecision and inconsistency—internal dissensions. Had they been all of one mind, they would not have halted so long between two opinions, and endeavoured not so much to achieve a settlement as to avoid the necessity of taking a decision. France and Russia, being singleminded, neither interfered nor fought: Sweden, equally singleminded, would, but for England, have both interfered and fought: England only took the course which indicates essentially a double mind—she interfered very vigorously, but showed an extreme reluctance to fight. It can scarcely be doubted that a division of opinion was the source of that fatal irresolution which kept us negotiating while Austria and Prussia were acting, and drove us on the hopeless resource of a Conference, flagrante bello. The Cabinet could not make up its mind on the one point which was essential to a decided and consistent policy—whether or not it would, in the last resort, rather fight for Denmark than allow her to be conquered; and, not having decided this question, it strove as long as possible to maintain a course admitting of either alternative, the result inevitably being a position in which neither alternative is capable of leading us to a result either honourable or satisfactory. If the Ministry had resolved not to fight in any event, they would, at the moment that Austria and Prussia declared their intention of making war, have uttered an indignant protest and withdrawn from further discussion, as Lord Londonderry and Mr. Canning decided to do when the Holy Alliance spurred on France to put down the liberties of Spain. But, as there was a strong war party in the Cabinet, this course was not adopted. Effort after effort was made to prevent the invasion of Denmark, or to turn it into a mere occupation of Slesvig for purposes of coercion; negotiation continued even while the armies were fighting. Instead of wrapping herself in a distant and cold neutrality like that of Russia or France, England gave Denmark every support but that of force; she finally succeeded, by dint of entreaty, menace, and intrigue, in assembling a Conference, in which to plead the cause of the injured and weaker party, and constituted herself so avowedly and openly the protectress of Denmark, that she cannot now, without incurring the ridicule and contempt of Europe, abandon her to her fate. On the other hand, if the Cabinet could have made up its mind to fight rather than abandon the 'integrity and independence of the Danish monarchy,' it is absurd to suppose that Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, and Mr. Gladstone would have been foolish enough to wait till Denmark had been overrun, and her defences torn from her. If it had been resolved to save Denmark at all hazards, Prussia and Austria would have been warned in December, that England would regard the passage of the Eider as a declaration of war. In all probability that threat would have arrested their career. All this must have been plain to the experienced eye of a Minister like Lord Palmerston; and it is impossible to suppose that had he been master in his Cabinet he would not have contrived either to keep the peace with honour, or to go to war with advantage. The fear that this vacillation would do precisely what it has done—the uneasy consciousness of a weak and unsteady hand on the reins of Government, fretted the temper of the House of Commons, and agitated the feelings of the country. And seldom has a more anxious audience crowded the benches and filled the galleries than that to which were addressed the explanations of Lord Palmerston on Monday night.

Those explanations fully confirmed the general opinion of the curious indecision and half-heartedness of the Ministerial policy. Of course, the Conference had been a dead failure. Prussia and Austria had with difficulty been got to state their demands, which had first amounted to nothing less than the separation of Holstein and Slesvig from Denmark: and throughout the negotiations they had behaved with great want of frankness and with grasping arrogance. Denmark was willing to cede Holstein and a morsel of Slesvig, but insisted on having a defensible frontier, which should not leave her at the mercy of Germany. The neutral Powers fixed on the line of the Schlei and the Dannewerke, to which Denmark acceded. Prussia and Austria would not accept this, and Denmark would not recede from it: and, after some further attempts of the neutrals to bring the belligerents to terms, the Conference broke up in despair. The natural conclusion of such a story would have been an announcement that Her Majesty had been advised to support Denmark in defending the line agreed on by the neutral Powers. But it seems that the peace party in the Cabinet had finally triumphed. Lord Palmerston announced that, considering the circumstances of the case, the neutrality of France and Russia, and the overwhelming military force which Austria and Prussia could throw into the Continental dominions of Denmark, the Cabinet thought it advisable not to fight; although, he added, if Copenhagen should be bombarded, its people slaughtered, and the King made prisoner, England might then find herself compelled to reconsider her policy.

These remarks provoked a severe rebuke from the leader of the Opposition, who denounced them as a continuation of those spiritless and senseless menaces which had done so much to lower the influence and authority of England. He gave notice of his intention to invite an expression of opinion upon the policy of the Government, and there can be no doubt that there will be an animated discussion. The feelings of the country are warmly with Denmark, and it is not particularly agreeable to the national vanity of England to be told that we are not strong enough for a single-handed encounter with Austria and Prussia.

We must not pass without notice a remarkable passage in the speech in which Lord Russell announced to the House of Lords the result of the Conference, and the determination of the Government. He had another plea for peace, besides the military strength of Austria and Prussia. Another element entered into his consideration.

The civil war now raging in America, ending how it may, whether by the establishment of an independent republic in the South, or whether it ends most unexpectedly, as it would be to me, I confess, by restoring the Union, still the United States of America or the Northern States, or whatever they may be called, will then be in a totally different position to that which they were in a few years ago. A great army will then be maintained by the United States. A formidable navy will also be kept up. Our relations with that Power are liable at any moment to interruption.

So that, after three years of coaxing and conciliation; after bearing endless wrongs from the North with patience, and inflicting systematic affronts upon the South without provocation, the friend of Mr. Adams and the ally of Mr. Seward is forced to reckon the probable hostility of the Federal Government among the sources from which England would have most to apprehend if she should once engage in a European war. This is a truly satisfactory result of a warm and friendly neutrality; of a policy which carried conciliation to the verge of cringing, and forbearance to the very brink of servility. We find that, even by Lord Russell's own confession, the United States are so bitterly and inveterately our enemies that we should be sure to have them on our backs if we were once engaged with any other foe; and this is all that we have obtained by sacrifices of pride and dignity which have keenly wounded our feelings at home and injured our prestige abroad. Could our position have been worse if we had pursued a line more consistent with the usual bearing of a great Power: if we had allowed no insult to pass unnoticed and no wrong to be inflicted on us with impunity; if we had held the balance even between North and South, and forborne to flout the latter or to flatter the former; if we had treated Yankee bluster with contempt and resented Yankee insolence with spirit, instead of indulging the vain hope of quieting arrogance by concession?

NAVAL PRECEDENTS.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—As the rescue of Captain Semmes and a portion of his equipage, and the Federal pretension to consider them as prisoners, have given rise to various speculations in the press, it may not be inopportune to recall an incident in the present war which, it appears to me, completely estoppes Captain Winslow from the claim advanced by him, even if that claim was admissible on its own merits. On February 1, 1863, the Confederate steamers, Palmetto State (Captain Rutledge) and Chicora (Captain Tucker), made an attack upon the Federal blockading fleet off Charleston Harbour, completely disabling and dispersing the latter. In the course of the action, the United States sloop of war Mercedita, 11 guns, surrendered to the Palmetto State. Commander Abbot, of the Mercedita, came on board the latter vessel, and formally completed the surrender, at the same time asking for assistance for the crew, as his ship was in a sinking condition and her boats useless, having in the confusion been lowered without putting in the plugs. Upon Commander Abbot's pledge, he and the entire crew of the Mercedita were paroled, and he ordered back to his vessel. A short time afterwards, however, the Mercedita, favoured by a dense fog, managed to escape, and made for Hilton Head.

Here, then, there was not only bodily possession of the ship, but an express parole given, which nevertheless did not prevent the Federal craft from escaping.

In this connection, also, it is worth while to refer to a curious correspondence between Admiral Collingwood and the Spanish Vice-Admiral D'Alava. D'Alava had been permitted to remain on board his captured ship, on account of the dangerous state of his wound, but, the ship being afterwards forced by stress of weather on the Spanish coast, he considered himself released by an act of Providence. Admiral Collingwood took a different view, on the ground that D'Alava's sword, 'the emblem of his service,' had been formally surrendered; but the nice question involved in this case has always been considered a disputed point among naval men.

In the case of Captain Semmes, you will observe that there was neither possession of the vanquished ship, nor surrender of sword, nor pledge of parole. He had just as much right to escape from captivity by accepting the friendly rescue of the Deerhound, as to swim to either French or English shore, if this had been physically possible.—I remain, respectfully yours, Neutral.

Torpedoes.—The Charleston Courier thus comments on the use of torpedoes:—'The first vessel of war destroyed by a torpedo was the United States ironclad boat Cairo, on the Yazoo river, in the fall of 1862, or winter of 1863. The Cairo was a formidable vessel, carrying thirteen guns and a crew of three hundred men. She was sunk by a torpedo—a simple contrivance, being nothing more than a demi-john filled with powder, and a friction primer inserted at the mouth. A wire was attached to this primer, by means of which the operator fired the powder as the vessel was passing over it. Since that time several new and valuable inventions of this character have been brought to the notice of the Confederate authorities, and the total damage inflicted is shown by the list of at least nine vessels which have been wholly or partially destroyed during the war, and, with the single exception of the Cairo, as stated above, all within the past year. Some vessels, in addition, not yet accounted for, may be charged to the torpedo account. In addition to this, three railroad trains in Tennessee, and one on the Ohio and Baltimore Railroad, have been destroyed by torpedoes within the last six months, and all this has been accomplished at a less cost in men and money than would be required to build, man, and equip the smallest gunboat in the Confederate navy.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: June 15, 1864.

THE STRATEGY OF GRANT—HIS LOSSES—HIS REINFORCEMENTS—THE POSITION OF SHERMAN—THE CONFEDERATE DEFEAT AT STAUNTON—THE DRAFT IN THE NORTH—THE DILEMMA OF THE GOVERNMENT—THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION—MR. LINCOLN'S PROSPECTS—THE CLEVELAND CONVENTION—THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—ANDREW JOHNSON.

The Southerners are in high spirits. Grant has 'changed his base.' That is the favourite Federal phrase for conveying the idea that he has changed his plans; finding the one in hand impracticable, he is going to try another. It is circumlocution for defeat; but the plain word is too ugly. Grant entered Virginia with a very large army, which he was willing to expend in order to reach Richmond, and proclaimed his intention 'to fight it out' on that line if it took 'all summer.' He found the Confederates barring his way at every point. He kept throwing huge masses upon formidable entrenchments and stubborn lines of Confederate soldiers, and was repulsed in every attempt to open the way. Every new movement to find a practicable way was heralded in the North as a brilliant strategic manœuvre to 'out-general' and 'out-flank' Lee. But somehow Lee was always before him, and the 'flanking' had to be repeated with enormous losses of men. At last in the leafy month of June, abandoning the 'line' to which he had vowed himself for a summer's work, he got within sight of Richmond, near the spot where he might have landed six weeks before with scarcely the loss of a man. But it was a place in which he could not stay. Lee was there covering the place with his powerful army carefully entrenched. One more effort was made to pierce these defences, and, after a bloody battle, the Union assault on the Confederate lines was repulsed with terrible slaughter at all points. It was the final effort to take Richmond from that quarter. Lincoln's plan and Grant's plan, with all its variations, including his constrained falling back on M'Clellan's repudiated plans as far as he could, have all failed. For more than a week the army has been quietly moving out of that spot—the saucy rebels call it retreating. There has been a loss of six weeks and fully 50,000 men, and now a new plan is to be tried. The whole original campaign of Grant is now a confessed failure. It is more—it is a frightful disaster. Grant's boasted generalship has been proved to be the obstinate piling of masses upon masses of his troops, in the determination to march, if need be, right over their dead bodies into the fortifications of Richmond. He repeated it again and again, until his bloody obstinacy has earned him, among his own officers, the muttered epithet of butcher, and the complaints among the men that they are used and wasted merely to fill up ditches, over which, nevertheless, the Union armies are never able to pass. I give the lowest possible computation when I say that 50,000 men have been sacrificed for nothing. That number is certainly put hors de combat for the war. Counting the actual loss to this army for the week in hand, there are well-informed men who say that in killed, wounded, prisoners, and missing—the last a huge number—the army of General Grant has lost at least eighty thousand of its original numbers. In the later battles it has been impossible to keep the new troops in the ranks when led up to the actual assault. The whole region about them swarms with stragglers, and the official reports, cautiously as they are drawn up, cannot conceal the fact that, on several occasions of impending battles, the veterans were called out to force the skulkers back to duty. The Government has been doing its best to fill up the depleted ranks by sending forward all the troops which it can call in from every quarter where they can be spared. Even hundred-day men, just called out in the West for the distinct purpose of garrisoning the frontier, in order that the enlisted men might be sent into the field, have been hurried on to strengthen Grant. There was almost a mutiny in the district when this order came. Large bodies of them threw down their arms and positively refused to go until the regulars were drawn up and compelled them to resume their muskets and march. They insisted that they were cheated into the service, having been called out for a distinct purpose, and being now used for a very different one; but they could not help themselves, and have gone down to the Virginian slaughter-pen. This is the sort of troops which go to replace the old soldiers who have been killed or disabled in Grant's marchings and countermarchings and useless attempts to force the Confederate lines in Southern Virginia. The actual numbers he has lost may be replaced, and probably he has now very nearly as many men as he had when he crossed the Rapidan. But he has lost largely of his best troops, and his reinforcements are mostly raw, and generally unwilling, recruits. It is with this force that he is seeking a new route by which he can transfer his attack to another point. His next demonstration will, it is thought, be on the south side of the James River, as soon as he can get the transportation and carry his army across, to form a junction with Butler.

The failure of Sherman in the campaign against Atlanta is not so fully developed; but there are growing apprehensions that his victories over Johnston are as unreal and infructuous as those of Grant over Lee. There has been for some time an ominous silence in the bulletins from the War Department about the operations in Georgia, other than the stereotyped announcement that everything is quiet or is doing well, and that Sherman is getting ready to do something brilliant very soon. The Confederates say that Sherman has got on so far from the base of his supplies, has so entangled himself in a difficult country, has so formidable an enemy in front, and such active assailants in his rear, that his position is one of peril. They say that he cannot go forward without fighting at a disadvantage, that he cannot retreat without ruin, that he must fight and win a series of battles before he has any chance of getting into Atlanta, and that the loss of any one of these would be fatal to his army. This view of the position of affairs there is strengthened by the complaints of officers on that line which find their way into the Northern papers. A correspondent of the Tribune of this city wrote for that paper in the following strain, at the very time that the public despatches were giving glowing accounts of the victorious progress of Sherman:—'The conformation of the country—its creeks, tortuous ravines, irregular hills, almost defying topographical delineation, and dense woods, obscuring all observation of the world beyond—resembling, in fact, the country about Dalton and Resaca—has very much the appearance of a huge trap purposely prepared for us. To the enemy every foot of the ground is familiar. To us it is a very terra incognita. Involved in these labyrinths, defended by sharp practice on the part of the rebel skirmishers, and by the masked batteries on which we were liable to stumble at every step of progress, for the first three days, the enemy had everything his own way. Our huge army, like a strong man fighting blindfold, has been continually feeling for the enemy, getting into position, distributing the forces, and bringing up its interminable wagon trains under protection of its own lines. Meantime, skirmishing has been going on continually. Not an instant, day or night, has there been a cessation of the eternal pop-pop, bang-bang of guns, large and small, around the lines; first from right to left, and then back again in continuous roar and rattle, until the ear has become so accustomed to the sound it ceases to attract attention. By degrees the programme of the enemy seems to reveal itself. Posted in his chosen position behind works which he is daily making stronger, he stands chiefly on the defensive, awaiting our attack. Meantime he will give us no rest day or night. Every day he has shelled our batteries, our wagon-trains, our headquarters. Every night he has made two or three assaults or feints upon one part or all parts of our extended line, rousing the whole camp, calling the men to arms, and keeping them on the qui vive, until long watching, harassment, and its inevitable fatigues are doing the work of decimation in our ranks as effectually by piecemeal as the wholesale slaughter of a great battle.'

It is reported that General A. J. Smith's troops, which were lately in Louisiana, and were forced back into Arkansas by the Confederates under Kirby Smith and Taylor, are on their way to reinforce Sherman, and that the trans-Mississippi troops of the Confederates are hastening towards the east to strengthen the armies of Lee or Johnston at the central points, where the great interest of the struggle and the efforts of both parties are now concentrated. Texas and Western Louisiana are abandoned by the Federals, and their hold is loosened on Arkansas; and the Confederates are up again and extremely active in Missouri. The navigation of the Mississippi River is constantly obstructed by the activity of the Confederates, and has been lately closed entirely by batteries planted in Washington County, Mississippi. West Tennessee and Kentucky are swarming with Confederate cavalry, and large bodies of them are hanging about the rear of Sherman's forces and threatening his communications.

The one Confederate defeat to be recorded is the capture of Staunton, in Virginia, by the troops under General Hunter, with the loss of artillery and stores to a considerable amount. A great deal is made of it in the newspapers, by daily repetition and exaggeration, to set off the inaction which prevails in other quarters, and turn enquiry from the cause of the cessation of the daily shower of glorious bulletins from Virginia and Georgia.

There is no longer any uncertainty about the new levy for three hundred thousand men. Operations drag everywhere for the want of troops. The Union armies—with what remains to them of the 1,800,000 men heretofore called out under the several proclamations of the President—are held at bay everywhere by Southern armies. The spirit for volunteering is totally extinct. The largest bounties will not bring up recruits, and nothing remains but the rigid enforcement of a pitiless law of conscription. The draft will not be ordered until Congress has amended the law, so as to make it more sweeping in its scope and more effective in execution. The question which is most debated now is whether the commutation clause shall be continued or repealed. It has been found that while the privilege exists of purchasing exemption from service by the payment of $300, the Government gets 'money but few recruits. States, and counties, and cities have loaded themselves with heavy debts to provide commutation money and bounties, in order to avoid the social and political troubles of a compulsory drafting, and they can do little more. They despair of averting the great peril of a large draft, and, therefore, there is a sort of hopeless resignation to necessity, which counsels the abolishing of exemption fees and bounties, and the bold resort to naked and uncompensated compulsion.

The dilemma is a serious one. Not to repeal the commutation clause is to encounter the certainty of a draft for a large portion of the number required, and thus to lose the chief advantage proposed in the great outlay which was to save the unwilling poor from being taken forcibly away from their homes, and keep the popular expressions of discontent from taking a form dangerous to the peace and property of the community. To repeal it, leaving in the law the privilege to buy substitutes, gives an odious advantage to the man of wealth, and throws all the personal burdens of fighting battles on the poor. Both ways there are difficulties ahead, between which it is hard for Congress to make a selection. Either way the new draft will be extremely distressing upon the labouring classes, and it is greatly feared that it will dangerously increase the popular repugnance to the war and the popular reaction against its authors. The drain of the working men of the country, to renew the armies and die in the battle-fields and hospitals, is already severely felt in the dearth of labour; the drawing off of three hundred thousand more of the most active and vigorous of the male population is a subject for gloomy anticipation to those who must go and those that remain. The North is paying annual tithes of its best blood and muscle for the privilege of attempting to overrun and destroy the South; and its reward is coming in this rapid collapse of its own physical strength and the constant terror of revolutionary reaction.

Nevertheless, the necessities are great, and the drafting process must go on, or the war must be abandoned. There will be exciting, if not alarming times, when this draft comes to be enforced. After it gets through will come a resulting question, which is thought of with great fear by the politicians: What effect is the harsh measure, and all the antecedent and following circumstances, to have on the Presidential election next fall? It almost seems that, among politicians, in Congress and out of it, leaders of public opinion, and aspirants for public station, who have the direction of public affairs at Washington and of party movements elsewhere, this question of 'Who shall be the next President?' occupies more thought and creates more care than the fortunes of the war, except so far as military events advance or retard the prospects of candidates.

Two Conventions, within the past fortnight, have been engaged in President-making, and presented two sets of candidates for President and Vice-President. There are more yet to be held. The Democratic Convention is to assemble at Chicago on July 4; and it is by no means certain that there will not be a fourth, of Peace Democrats, who will not consent to endorse the war policy which the majority of the Democrats at Chicago appear now to be determined on adopting. There may be still a fifth, called later in the summer, to try and negotiate a combination among all the branches of the opposition to agree on a single ticket to be turned against Mr. Lincoln; and a sixth for the same narrow purpose of attempting to turn over the bulk of the Democratic votes to the support of General Fremont as the best chance for overthrowing the party in power. It will be observed from this that the political elements are very much disturbed, and that it is difficult to prognosticate, or even to conjecture, what form they may ultimately take, or to what final issue the possible combinations may lead. Some of the elements of the calculation are fixed; others, perhaps controlling ones, remain to be developed.

The Government ticket of Lincoln and Johnson, nominated at Baltimore, starts with immense advantages. It has the 'regular' nomination of a large party, lately a triumphant one in the elections, and apparently still the controlling party in the country. That fact brings to it the great force of party discipline. It is, too, the party of the Government when the Government is engaged in conducting a great war. It is a powerful plea against a change of Administration, that large operations are going on against the public enemy, which it is inexpedient to disclose. The overthrow of an executive in the midst of a war might seriously damage very important measures, and greatly encourage the enemy; so at least it may be plausibly urged, and the party in power make good use of the plea. A third element of strength is the possession of the enormous patronage of the Executive office, and the formidable control over the expression of adverse opinions which the concentration of military power has placed in the hands of the incumbent, and the patient submission of the people to the extreme and arbitrary use of it has enabled him to employ for his own purposes. The Convention which nominated him was the reflex of his own will through these agencies. It did not meet to deliberate, it was appointed to nominate him; and a large proportion of the members were directly his dependents, office-holders of his own appointment, contractors and jobbers, and speculators with the host of friends and followers whose means of living and hopes of fortune are derived from his favour, and depend on his continuance in power. The passion for war, artfully managed, has thrown into the hands of soldiers in the field a right of suffrage which is thought to be sufficient of itself to determine the issue in some of the largest of the States, and thus decide the result of the election; and the President, by his appointing power in the selection of officers and his political use of it, has manipulated the armies into great voting machines, to be managed by his partisans for his benefit. These are tremendous forces with which Mr. Lincoln enters the field for reelection. They were believed by his partisans to be irresistible. But there are some signs of a breaking up of the combinations which have hitherto sustained the President in every act, however lawless and tyrannical, and punished free speech against the Administration as disloyalty to the Government. The first demonstration was the defection of a considerable section of the party before the Baltimore Convention met. They denounced it, in advance, as a packed and corrupt assemblage, and went to Cleveland in mass convention, and there nominated candidates of their own in Fremont and Cochrane, on the express ground of opposition to the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. They denounced him personally for the imbecility of his administration, and his own want of capacity and principle:

For his violations of the Constitution and the principles of civil liberty, in the usurpation of military over civil power, in his arbitrary arrests, suppressions of free speech and a free press, and suspensions of the habeas corpus;

For his renunciation of the Monroe doctrine, and toleration of a Mexican empire erected by foreign force on the ruins of an American republic; and

For the servile sacrifice of the right of asylum in secretly seizing the Spaniard Arguelles and sending and delivering him to the Spanish authorities in Cuba, by executive order, without the authority of law or judicial enquiry.

In respect to the war, the Cleveland meeting was so ultra violent, in its declarations against the South, for warfare without pause or compromise, and there is unconditional submission, for the utter and immediate extinction of slavery and the universal confiscation of Southern States to the uses of the Northern soldiers who may go down and conquer them, that the Baltimore Convention, when it met afterwards, found it difficult to keep up with them. The points of difference between the two Conventions and the men they placed in nomination, are expressed in their opposite view of the means which can be legitimately employed for the complete subjugation and occupation of the Southern states. The Cleveland candidates hold, in the language of General Fremont, that resistance to the reelection of Mr. Lincoln, by organising against him 'every element of conservative opposition,' is indispensable in order to bring the people to realise that while we are saturating Southern soil with the best blood in the country in the name of liberty, we have really parted with it at home.'

The Convention at Baltimore, while it affected to despise the Fremont demonstration at Cleveland as utterly insignificant as a political movement, showed in its own proceedings how sensitive its managing leaders are to some of the gravest of these imputations on their candidate, and how anxious they are to avoid a direct issue upon them before the people. Their mission to Baltimore required them to nominate their patron for reelection. The forms of consistency exacted a vote in approval of his administration. But their political astuteness taught them that they must shun the giving of such definite pledges on particular acts as would require them to defend specifically measures against which such imposing remonstrances were made by members of their own political communion. As soon as the Convention had finished its work and adjourned, its orators and presses in numerous places began to construe away the resolution of general approval of Mr. Lincoln's administration. It is argued that they never meant to approve of these measures as constitutional in a normal state of the country, but as exceptional acts beyond the Constitution, justified by the necessity of preserving the national life, which might otherwise have perished. They excuse their President by inculpating themselves as having condoned the gravest of political crimes in approving of the deliberate violation of the fundamental law; and they think they atone for it for themselves and for him by the promise that the crime shall not be continued longer than the occasion, and will not be repeated until another occasion shall arise. The defence is not accepted by the followers of General Fremont. They are organising for a vigorous canvass, as though their separation on this point were final and irrevocable.

Not much can be said at this early day in favour of the chances of this looked-for positive success in the election of the candidates, but in the state of disintegration which threatens to overtake all parties, it is a formidable power to be taken into the account for any new combinations. A large portion of the Democratic party believe that it will very much damage the Baltimore ticket, and are disposed to improve it to their own advantage. Some crude propositions, which may perhaps come to something hereafter, have already been thrown out in the journals of the War Democracy, for a fusion with the Fremont men, by running unpledged tickets of electors for joint votes, and, if a sufficient number are chosen, to combine them afterwards on some single candidate, to defeat Mr. Lincoln. In that shape the coalition is clearly impracticable, and will have to be abandoned or so modified as to effect a combination of purpose, without a combination of votes, sufficiently positive to bring out the full strength of the opposition for favourite candidates. The Democrats begin to believe that, if they can agree among themselves on a single and powerful name, the supporters of Fremont can draw off such a number of votes from Mr. Lincoln in Republican States, that the Democrat will succeed. But for this purpose delay in the nomination is indispensable. The Fremont movement must be left to grow into a state of greater exasperation with the Administration party, and make its separate organisation complete. The Democrats, too, want time for the purpose of effecting a better understanding among themselves. The feud between the War Democrats and the Peace Democrats is increasing in bitterness, and there is an imminent danger that if a Convention were held now, they might fall into discords as violent as those which have broken out between Fremont and Lincoln. A very powerful effort is now going on among the leading men of the party to have the meeting of the Convention postponed to a later day than July 4, for which it has been convoked. There are plausible reasons assigned for this, in the state of public affairs, and the high probability that events will occur within a brief period which may change the aspects and objects of parties, and designate a line of policy and a candidate different from those which might be adopted early in July. It is considered wise to wait and watch without precipitating division among themselves, and to take advantage of the precipitancy of their adversaries. The Peace men among them are particularly anxious for this postponement; for the belief is fixed among them that they grow stronger every day that the war goes on, and its hopeless and horrible character and ruinous consequences develope themselves in the embarrassments and defeats of the Government and the sufferings of the people. There is a deep current of feeling running in that direction, and I am inclined to think that under no state of circumstances can the bulk of the Peace Democrats be brought to vote for any candidate whose election will be held to be a pledge for the continuance of the war.

The Vice-President of the United States has no place in the administration of the government. He has no other duties than to preside in the Senate. The office is only of contingent importance, as providing a successor in the event of a vacancy in the office of President, which has twice occurred in the history of the country, but is not taken into the account in the selection of a candidate. The Vice-Presidency is usually bestowed on some political friend of the party in power, who belongs to a section of the country different from that from which the President is selected. Lincoln and Hamlin were both from the North, where, in the furious party rage of 1860, the Presidency was to be won by concentrating Northern action against the South. In 1864, there is a semblance of returning to the old practice, and a Southern-born man is selected for the Vice-Presidency. They could not have found one more willing to be a servile tool of the North, or a blacker traitor to his own kindred and country, than Andrew Johnson of Tennessee.

The history of this man is a singular one. His early life was a struggle with extreme poverty. His origin was very humble, and he was brought up as a tailor. Whatever mental training he has was acquired by himself when working at his trade for a living. He rose to be Governor of the State, Senator in the United States Congress, to be named by a section of party friends in his State as their choice for the Presidency of the United States in 1860, and now to be nominated by a triumphant faction to be, as they think surely, Vice-President. In all this career, he has never shown administrative capacity or statesmanship or done any public service. He is the same audacious and unprincipled demagogue he commenced by being, and has the same Jacobin notions and grovelling tactics which made him the leader of the populace, and have given him a success which is a reproach to the party which he attached himself to and contrived to make the instrument of his advancement. He has an acute mind, great self-confidence, strong passions, and a great power of will, which, aided by a natural faculty for fluent speaking, gave him a paramount influence with the rude and illiterate population of East Tennessee. The favourite leader of an important section of the Democratic party, he had the force through the convention system to make himself the head of the party in the State, against the struggles of whatever was cultivated and conservative among them. His power was achieved by assiduous courting of the lowest instincts of the populace. There has been no Radical issue ever brought forward to catch the votes of the multitude that Johnson did not take it up immediately and go beyond the author in the race for favour among the have-nothings, except in respect to slavery. Living in a slave State, but not in the heavy slaveholding section, it was in his interest to support slavery, and he did it vehemently and as intolerantly against the North as a South Carolina or Georgian planter, until the conflict with the North came on, and numbers and power and force were thrown on the side against slavery. Then he suddenly went over to its adversaries, and became a furious partisan of extreme Northern ideas. He was among the first for that abomination, an elective judiciary; he was for choosing Senators for Congress by the direct vote of the people of the States instead of the Legislatures; he wanted postmasters chosen at elections; and he is the father of the project for dividing the public lands among the landless of all countries. He has become the very Beecher of Abolitionism, and acting under Lincoln's appointment as the military Governor of Tennessee, he has shown himself as remorseless, as vindictive and cruel as Butler.

A BURIAL AT SEA.—A Nassau paper of June 4 publishes the following:—'A melancholy incident occurred on Friday of last week upon the steamship Fannie, while being chased by a Yankee man-of-war. One of the passengers on board, Captain Frank Du Barry, late Chief of Ordnance on General Beauregard's Staff, C.S.A., died that morning. Preparations had to be completed for his burial, which took place amid all the excitement of the chase. A burial at sea is a ceremony at all times full of solemnity, but it is when coupled with such events as this, that war assumes its most repulsive aspect. In that frail little steamer quivering with her efforts to escape the relentless fate bearing down on her with frowning guns and the ferocity of the tiger, while every living heart on board was throbbing with anxiety for safety, they were suddenly called upon to render the last and most solemn rites known to our existence. No time then to stop in mid-ocean, while words that consigned "dust to dust," "ashes to ashes," went up in presence of the grim destroyer, but still dashing onwards through the waves, a short and hurried service—a heavy splash—and a body sank to its eternal resting-place in the broad ocean's bosom, while all that was dear to it in life sped from it on its way, like the arrow from the bow.'

LETTER FROM NASSAU.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NASSAU: June 6, 1864.

THE tone of the correspondence received from the Confederacy becomes more cheering every day, and as an evidence of increasing confidence it is worthy of note that gold exhibited a marked and steady decline in Wilmington and Charleston while the battles in front of Richmond were in actual progress. Speaking of Charleston, we would remark that it is now considered quite as eligible a port for blockade-running as Wilmington, and trade with it has been resumed. We are told that its people have become so habituated to the constant bombardment, that the negroes throng the dangerous portion of the city for the purpose of being the first upon the spot to secure such shells as do not explode, much in the same way as boys are wont to scramble for apples—the shells being all purchased at a fair price at the arsenal.

Since last writing the Yankee cruisers have made some valuable captures, among which are two boats from this port, both on the return of their first trip, viz. the Young Republic and Greyhound, against which we have received the following additions to our commerce:—Letter B, Badger, Georgina M'Caw, Fox, Prince Albert, and Jupiter—all, we believe, from Liverpool except one from London. The 'blockade statistics' for the past month exhibit as follows:—

ARRIVALS.—May 16, Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington; Rothsay Castle, Charleston; 26, Lucy, Wilmington; 30, Fanny, Wilmington; Alice, Wilmington; Mars, Charleston; Annie, Wilmington; 31, Syren, Wilmington; June 1, Coquette, Wilmington; 4, Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington.

DEPARTURES.—May 9, Coquette, Wilmington; Lucy, Wilmington; 23, City Petersburg, Wilmington; 25, Badger, Wilmington; 26, Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington; 27, Georgina M'Caw, Wilmington; Rose, Wilmington; 28, Lucy, Wilmington; June 3, Annie, destination not known; Syren, ditto; Fox, ditto; Coquette, ditto; Alice, ditto.

By the arrival of s. s. Will o' the Wisp, we are in receipt of dates to June 1, which report safe arrival of all to that time, thus showing in the past month twenty successful evasions of the efficient (?) blockade to two unsuccessful. The Badger was run aground inside the harbour, but will be got off, the cargo having already been safely landed.

Business is now very quiet with us; the stock of supplies in the Confederacy is fair, and the anxiety felt in regard to military operations militates against business; its activity will not be resumed until something more decisive takes place. In the meanwhile, stocks here are enlarging, and preparations being made for a heavier business, in view of the large number of additions to the commerce we anticipate in the next few months. Local affairs are dull. His Excellency Governor Bayley leaves for England by this mail, where, we trust, he will meet the reception to which his admirable and impartial administration of the government of this colony, under the most peculiar and difficult circumstances, richly entitles him. Prices show little change over quotations in my last. Saltpetre is in great demand, and will realise a fair profit. At present there is none in the market, and only thirty tons on the way, all of which has been sold to arrive at 55*s.* to 56*s.* per cwt.

'SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE' IN THE BOLTON DISTRICT.

A PUBLIC meeting was held on Friday evening at Farnworth (Bolton) to hear a lecture from the Secretary of the Southern Independence Association (Mr. T. B. Kershaw), and to consider the propriety of basing a resolution thereon, such resolution, if carried, to be forwarded, together with a petition to Parliament signed by the inhabitants of the town, to Mr. Lindsay, M.P., in anticipation of the motion about to be brought on by that hon. gentleman in the House of Commons.

Farnworth, it should be mentioned, is one of the most populous outlying towns in the Bolton district; and, as in all other places of greater or less importance, not only the wealthy and educated, but nearly the whole body of respectable people in humbler life have long since shown a determination to declare for themselves their own opinions upon American affairs. The strong Southern feeling now existing there, or rather the open and bold expression of it, is entirely due to the indignation caused by the shameless practices resorted to by the Union and Emancipation Society in its endeavours some two years ago to misrepresent, for political purposes, popular sympathy in the north of England. Thanks, however, to the counter-operations of the Southern Independence Association, not only has the wrong been made right, but a fit and proper measure of punishment has everywhere overtaken the offenders. For instance, in Farnworth the clergy of all denominations (except Mr. Ward Beecher's) are 'Southern,' and consider themselves fully justified in taking their places on the political platform to advocate other doctrines than those held and preached amongst us by that eminent war-christian. The magistrates, local gentry, and the great bulk of county voters are Southern to a man. All the considerable manufacturing firms but one (a representative of which was the sole Northern opponent, as a man of respectability, at the meeting on Friday night) are known to favour the Confederate cause, and have expressed their desire to sign a memorial to Her Majesty's Government for the recognition of the South. With respect to the tradesmen, artisans, and operatives of the town, their opinions were sufficiently attested by the overwhelming majority in which they mustered in the body of the New Hall on the occasion of Mr. Kershaw's lecture.

The subject of the lecture was 'The American Constitution and Southern Secession.' John Hall, Esq., borough solicitor for Bolton, was voted to the chair, and among his supporters on the platform were the Rev. W. Woodman, Captain Whittam, Lieutenant Whittam, Ensign Hardman, Simeon Dyson, Esq., W. H. Hayman, Esq., Robert Briercliffe, Esq., J. Greenhalgh, Esq., &c., &c. An emissary of the Union and Emancipation Society subsequently made his appearance in the body of the hall, and, assisted as he was by about a score of youths, created some disturbance, which, however, had only the effect of bringing out in fuller force the strong Southern feeling prevailing in the Bolton district.

The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, said he did not doubt that the subject of Mr. Kershaw's lecture, and, above all, Mr. Kershaw's ability in handling it, would prove distasteful to the few Northerners who were present; yet he trusted that even those who differed from Mr. Kershaw would give that gentleman a fair and thoughtful hearing. It was stated some time ago in the Times that a certain Federal general, who had failed in his generalship, took to trying his hand at definition. He defined the rights of the South. He said the Southerners had only two rights worth mentioning: one the right to be hanged, the other the right to be damned—one a constitutional, the other a divine right. The only favour he (the Chairman) had to ask was, that, instead of limiting their rights to two, they would grant the Southerners a third one—viz. the right to be heard.

Mr. Kershaw, upon the strength of this rather happy introduction, presented himself on the platform amid the most eager applause, and delivered his lecture amid repeated marks of the most cordial approval. He commenced by examining, after his own popular manner, the origin and history of the American Constitution—quoting, memoriter, but, as usual, with strict accuracy, various facts and arguments derived from reports of States conventions, many of the resolutions and amendments adopted or rejected from time to time; calling attention to the strongest points which bore most conclusively upon his subject, and furnishing date, place, and person for every authority he adduced. The people of the United States, he said, knew no more who made the Constitution than the audience he was addressing. It was made with closed doors, and newspaper reporters were shut out. The Constitution was, in fact, imposed upon the people. New York, New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia, all refused to sign it, and yet it was said to have been done 'unanimously.' One of the powers delegated to the Lower House by the Constitution was the power of taxation; and in that branch of the Legislature, as was well known, the Northern States had always possessed a majority. And how did those States exercise that superiority? By instituting such enormously high tariffs that Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, with all their Federal sympathies, must have gone into the other lobby. At the conclusion of his lecture, Mr. Kershaw, referring to the news of that morning, said the mail had brought the proud intelligence that the people of the South were more determined than ever, and more competent than ever, to hold out to the last; nor would they, under any circumstances, yield an inch to the power or to the numbers of their infuriated enemies. It was now computed that since Grant made his first move in the present campaign, his losses, all told, are nothing short of 100,000 men. God Grant so much bloodshed may so n cry for a righteous retribution upon those who caused it, and who yet thirst for more!

Samuel Gee, Esq. (the solitary 'Northerner' of his respectable position, above referred to), attempted to address the meeting on behalf of the North, and protested against the passing of a Southern resolution, of which due notice had not been previously given.

The Chairman ruled in favour of testing the meeting by a resolution; but Mr. Gee continued to protest. The result was that the meeting was thrown into disorder, although the applause with which the resolution was carried was more than sufficient to drown the feeble opposition of Mr. Gee and the young lads. It was proposed by Captain Whittam, and seconded by the Rev. W. Woodman, and ran in the following terms:—'That this meeting, seeing the hopelessness of the North in its attempts to restore the Union and subjugate the South, and feeling that the continuance of the war is merely a wanton waste of life, is of opinion that the time has arrived when Her Majesty's Ministers should advise Her Majesty, in conjunction with other European sovereigns, to interpose for the purpose of bringing about peace by the recognition of the Southern States.'

Upon that resolution being put to the meeting, a forest of hands was held up in approval of it, and that demonstration was followed by a waving of hats and caps and a hurricane of applause. The Chairman declared it to have been duly carried by an overwhelming majority.

THE LINCOLNITE PLATFORM.

THE following are the resolutions adopted at the Baltimore Convention:—

1. Resolved, That it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain against all their enemies the integrity of the Union and the paramount authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that, laying aside all differences and political opinions, we pledge ourselves, as Union men, animated by a common sentiment and aiming at a common object, to do everything in our power to aid the Government in quelling by force of arms the rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes the rebels and traitors arrayed against it.

2. Resolved, That we approve the determination of the Government of the United States not to compromise with rebels or to offer any terms of peace except such as may be based upon an 'unconditional surrender' of their hostility and a return to their just allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that we call upon the Government to maintain this position and to prosecute the war with the utmost possible vigour to the complete suppression of the rebellion, in full reliance upon the self-sacrifice, the patriotism, the heroic valour, and the enduring devotion of the American people to their country and its free institutions.

3. Resolved, That as slavery was the cause and now constitutes the strength of this rebellion, and as it must be always and everywhere hostile to the principles of Republican government, justice and the national safety demand its utter and complete extirpation from the soil of the Republic; and that we uphold and maintain the acts and proclamations by which the Government, in its own defence, has aimed a death-blow at this gigantic evil. We are in favour, furthermore, of such an amendment to the Constitution, to be made by the people in conformity with its provisions, as shall terminate and for ever prohibit the existence of slavery within the limits or the jurisdiction of the United States.

4. Resolved, That the thanks of the American people are due to the soldiers and sailors of the army and the navy, who have perilled their lives in defence of their country and in vindication of the honour of the flag; that the nation owes to them some permanent recognition of their patriotism and their valour, and ample and permanent provision for those of their survivors who have received disabling and honourable wounds in the service of the country; and that the memories of those who have fallen in its defence shall be held in grateful and everlasting remembrance.

5. Resolved, That we approve and applaud the practical wisdom, the unselfish patriotism, and unswerving fidelity to the Constitution and the principles of American liberty, with which Abraham Lincoln has discharged, under circumstances of unparalleled difficulty, the great duties and responsibilities of the Presidential office; that we approve and endorse, as demanded by the emergency and essential to the preservation of the nation, and as within the Constitution, the measures and acts which he has adopted to defend the nation against its open and secret foes; that we approve especially the proclamation of emancipation and the employment as Union soldiers of men heretofore held in slavery; and that we have full confidence in his determination to carry these and all other constitutional measures essential to the salvation of the country into full and complete effect.

6. Resolved, That we deem it essential to the general welfare that harmony should prevail in the national councils, and we regard as worthy of public confidence and official trust those only who cordially endorse the principles proclaimed in these resolutions, and which should characterise the administration of the Government.

7. Resolved, That the Government owes to all men employed in the armies, without regard to distinction of colour, the full protection of the laws of war, and that any violation of these laws or of the usages of civilised nations in the time of war by the rebels now in arms should be made the subject of full and prompt redress.

8. Resolved, That the foreign immigration which in the past has added so much to the wealth and development of resources and increase of power to this nation—the asylum of the oppressed of all nations—should be fostered and encouraged by a liberal and just policy.

9. Resolved, That we are in favour of the speedy construction of the railroad to the Pacific.

10. Resolved, That the national faith pledged for the redemption of the public debt must be kept inviolate, and that for this purpose we recommend economy and rigid responsibility in the public expenditures, and a vigorous and just system of taxation; that it is the duty of every loyal State to sustain the credit and promote the use of the national currency.

11. Resolved, That we approve the position taken by the Government, that the people of the United States can never regard with indifference the attempt of any European Power to overthrow by force or to supplant by fraud the institutions of any republican government on the Western Continent; and that they will view with extreme jealousy, as menacing to the peace and independence of this our country, the effort of any such Power to obtain new footholds for monarchical governments sustained by a foreign military force in near proximity to the United States.

GENERAL JOHNSTON'S ARMY.

In the Field, May 22, 1864.

Were I a bird now, I would be warbling upon one of the leafy boughs above me; or, stood I in the hunting jacket of rare old Christopher North, I'd be chanting you a prose poem to the glory of this gushing Sunday morning in May. But, alas!—worse luck to it—I am neither the one nor the other, albeit the birds are singing upon a thousand branches all around me as I write, and here's a volume of the veritable 'Noctes,' which I picked up in a deserted mansion near Cartersville. They remind me of days now gone for ever. Indeed, the day with its freshening verdure, its breezy skies, and its profound stillness—a stillness which drinks in the murmur of the streams, the carols of the birds, and the hum of the waving forests, and melts them into a balm to the travel-worn and march-laden—the day, I repeat, brings back to me the long ago. I cast my eye down the vista which sweeps away among the Etowah hills, and somehow a time when I passed my nights among the Bohemians of a distant land, and my mornings in joint communion with your readers, rises in the misty distance. I refer to a period when I was your '—— correspondent,' and chronicled in these columns how Kean acted and Bosio sang—how Flora M'Flimsey flirted and Baron Bobadil swindled—how the men of letters sneered at one another, and the opera folks squabbled outright—how the politician schemed, the diplomatist wove his silken web, and the charlatan flourished—and finally how the natural consequences of so much sulphur in the firmament caused one great combustion and war, whirling the two nations into arms and your poor friend from a mahogany stool into the saddle of a guerilla, presto! How the scene has changed its hue, and what strange adventures have the times begot! Why, it was only the other day I met my old friend Arno, the baritone, among a group of Yankee prisoners. He had absolutely come to be chief of a military band. 'I was ver poor,' said he, 'and opere no thrive for me.' And, as I rode over the field of Resaca, I passed by the dead body of Raymond the actor. He wore the straps of a captain, and a bullet had passed through his forehead; but I could recognise the old jovial face, and I muttered: 'Fool: thou wert happy, healthful, and at peace with all the world as Harlequin. Now art thou gaping in the moonlight with a spot of tragedy upon thee no bigger than a partridge egg, yet suffice for time everlasting! Go to, thou wretched fool, to perk thyself in the glittering splendours of the soldier, and swap thy hundred deaths in pantomime for this rude jest in earnest.' Let us pass on; let's dry our eyes and look out on the present.

There's Joe Johnston riding down the field. He's not a man in buckram, I promise you. If there be a hero in this Southern land, that broad-brimmed white felt hat covers him. No man sits his saddle more gracefully; no man wears a neater uniform or becomes it more handsomely. Look at those little grey eyes, how they 'twinkle, twinkle, twinkle, with a crystalline delight.' Is he asleep? Ask the weasels! He rides among the skirmishers, and the bullets whistle about his ears, but dare not strike. He passes along the battle line. The men cheer him from wing to wing. He stops upon the hill, and all are confident, for be it in advance or be it in retreat, the prevailing spirit is confidence. I feel it myself. The troops feel it. The General himself feels it, and is grateful and cherishes it in his heart like a brave and good man. Never do you fear him; but defend him and wait. The campaign has but just begun. It will be the most splendid of the war before it is finished.

We left Dalton. We fought at Resaca. We skirmished from here to Altoona. We will fall back to the Chattahoochee. We are a moving and movable body, hunting for a fight and resolved not to make it until we are ready and have the selection of the ground. Then we will fight, and valiantly; then we will fight and to some purpose.

Thus far we have done our work well. We have abandoned forty miles of territory which were useless for military purposes, but we have killed ten thousand of the enemy at Resaca, losing but half that number, and we have gained a line which is capable of defence. Among the Yankee dead are Hooker and Kilpatrick. We have lost no general officer yet.

You hear much of certain flank movements on the part of Sherman. These are owing to the nature of the country. Sooner or later they will come to grief.

A full review of the campaign, from the Dalton gaps to the Etowah hills, would disclose a series of cheerful prognostics, and the situation at present bodes a happy triumph before the close of the month. We are pausing now for a moment of rest. We will journey again in a day or two. When the line in front of Atlanta is fully established, the 'heavy business' will commence, and the boom of cannon thunder over the country far and near.

To-day, Sunday, May 22, all is very quiet in front. A stray shot now and then startles the air, but only for an instant, then trembles into echo and then into silence.

THE ALABAMA AND THE KEARSAGE.

THE following correspondence has been published in the course of the past week.

To the Editor of the Daily News.

Sir,—There have been so many nonsensical publications on the engagements which took place between the Alabama and Kearsage, that it is my wish that a correction should be made.

In the first place, no challenge was sent by Captain Winslow; to have done so would have been to have violated the order of the Navy Department. On the contrary, Captain Winslow received a request from Captain Semmes not to leave, as he would fight the Kearsage, and would only occupy a day or two in his preparations. Five days, however, elapsed before they were completed. The Kearsage's battery consists of seven guns, two 11-inch Dahlgrens, four 32-pounders, one light rifle 28-pounder. The battery of the Alabama consisted of one 100-pounder rifle, one heavy 68 ditto, six 32-pounders—that is, one more gun than the Kearsage. In the wake of the engines on the outside the Kearsage had stopped up and down her sheet chains. These were stopped by marline to eye-bolts, which extended some 20 feet, and was done by the hands of the Kearsage; the whole was covered by light plank to prevent dirt collecting. It was for the purpose of protecting the engines when there was no coal in the upper part of the bunkers, as was the case when the action took place. The Alabama had her bunkers full, and was equally protected. The Kearsage went into action with a crew of 162 officers and men. The Alabama, by report of the Deerhound's officers, had 150.

The Kearsage steamed to sea in order that no questions of neutrality jurisdiction should be raised; when far enough she turned short round and steered immediately for the Alabama for close action. The Alabama fired as she was coming down on her two broadsides and a part of another; no one shot came on board the Kearsage. The Kearsage then sheered and opened on the Alabama, trying to get nearer. The action lasted one hour and two minutes from the first to the last shot. The Kearsage received twenty-eight shots above and below, thirteen about her hull; the best shots were abaft the mainmast, two shots which cut the chain stops, the shell of which broke the casing of wood covering. They were too high to have damaged the boilers had they penetrated. The Kearsage was only slightly damaged, and I supposed the action for hot work had just commenced when it ended. Such stuff as the Alabama firing when she was going down, and all such talk, is twaddle. The Alabama towards the last hoisted sail to get away, when the Kearsage was laid across her bows, and would have raked her had she not surrendered, which she had done, and was trying to get her flags down, and showing a white flag over the stern. The officers of the Alabama on board the Kearsage say that she was a complete slaughter-house, and was completely torn to pieces. This is all I know of the Alabama.

Yours, &c.

JOHN A. WINSLOW, Captain.

To the Editor of the Daily News.

Sir,—As two correspondents of your journal, in giving their versions of the fight between the Alabama and the Kearsage, have designated my share in the escape of Captain Semmes and a portion of the crew of the sunken ship as 'dishonourable,' and have moreover affirmed that my yacht, the Deerhound, was in the harbour of Cherbourg before the engagement, and proceeded thence on the morning of the engagement in order to assist the Alabama, I presume I may trespass upon your kindness so far as to ask for an opportunity to repudiate the imputation and deny the assertion. They admit that when the Alabama went down, the yacht, being near the Kearsage, was hailed by Captain Winslow, and requested to aid in picking up the men who were in the water; but they intimate that my services were expected to be merely ministerial; or, in other words, that I was to put myself under the command of Captain Winslow, and place my yacht at his disposal for the capture of the poor fellows who were struggling in the water for their lives. The fact is, that when we passed the Kearsage the captain cried out, 'For God's sake, do what you can to save them,' and that was my warrant for interfering in any way for the aid and succour of his enemies. It may be a question with some whether, without that warrant, I should have been justified in endeavouring to rescue any of the crew of the Alabama; but my own opinion is, that a man drowning in the open sea cannot be regarded as an enemy at the time to anybody, and is therefore entitled to the assistance of any passer-by. Be this as it may, I had the earnest request of Captain Winslow to rescue as many of the men who were in the water as I could lay hold of; but that request was not coupled with any stipulation to the effect that I should deliver up the rescued men to him as his prisoners. If it had been, I should have declined the task, because I should have deemed it dishonourable that is, inconsistent with my notions of honour to lend my yacht and crew for the purpose of rescuing those brave men from drowning only to hand them over to their enemies for imprisonment, ill-treatment, and perhaps execution. One of your correspondents opens his letter by expressing a desire to bring to the notice of the yacht clubs of England the conduct of the commander of the Deerhound which followed the engagement of the Alabama and Kearsage. Now that my conduct has been impugned, I am equally wishful that it should come under the notice of the yacht clubs of England, and I am quite willing to leave the point of 'honour' to be decided by my brother yachtsmen, and, indeed, by any tribunal of gentlemen. As to my legal right to take away Captain Semmes and his friends, I have been educated in the belief that an English ship is English territory, and I am, therefore, unable even now to discover why I was more bound to surrender the people of the Alabama, whom I had on board my yacht, than the owner of a garden on the south coast of England would have been if they had swum to such a place and landed there, or than the Mayor of Southampton was when they were lodging in that city, or than the British Government is now that it is known that they are somewhere in England.

Your other correspondent says that Captain Winslow declares that 'the reason he did not pursue the Deerhound or fire into her was that he could not believe at the time that any one carrying the flag of the Royal Yacht Squadron could act so dishonourable a part as to carry off the prisoners whom he had requested him to save from feelings of humanity.' I was not aware then, and I am not aware now, that the men whom I saved were or ever had been his prisoners. Whether any of the circumstances which had preceded the sinking of the Alabama constituted them prisoners was a question that never came under my consideration, and one which I am not disposed to discuss even now. I can only say that it is new doctrine to me that, when one ship sinks another in warfare, the crew of the sunken ship are debarred from swimming for their lives and seeking refuge wherever they can find it, and it is a doctrine which I shall not accept unless backed by better authority than that of the master of the Kearsage. What Captain Winslow's notion of humanity may be is a point beyond my knowledge; but I have good reason for believing that not many members of the Royal Yacht Squadron would, from 'motives of humanity,' have taken Captain Semmes from the water in order to give him up to the tender mercies of Captain Winslow and his compatriots. Another reason than that assigned by your correspondent for that hero's forbearance may be imagined in the reflection that such a performance as that of Captain Wilkes, who dragged two 'enemies,' or 'rebels,' from an English ship, would not bear repetition. Your anonymous correspondent further says that 'Captain Winslow would now have all the officers and men of the Alabama as prisoners had he not placed too much confidence in the honour of an Englishman who carried the flag of the Royal Yacht Squadron.' This is a very questionable assertion; for why did Captain Winslow confide in that Englishman? Why did he implore his interference, calling out, 'For God's sake do what you can to save them'? I presume it was because he could not or would not save them himself. The fact is that, if the captain and crew of the Alabama had depended for safety altogether upon Captain Winslow, not one half of them would have been saved. He got quite as many of them as he could lay hold of time enough to deliver them from drowning.

I come now to the more definite charges advanced by your correspondents, and these I will soon dispose of. They maintain that my yacht was in the harbour of Cherbourg for the purpose of assisting the Alabama, and that her movements before the action prove that she attended her for the same object. My impression is that the yacht was in Cherbourg to suit my convenience and pleasure, and I am quite sure that when there I neither did, nor intended to do, anything to serve the Alabama. We steamed out on Sunday morning to see the engagement, and the resolution to do so was the result of a family council whereat the question 'to go out,' or 'not to go out,' was duly discussed, and the decision in the affirmative was carried by the juveniles rather against the wish of both myself and my wife. Had I contemplated taking any part in the movements of the Alabama, I do not think I should have been accompanied by my wife and several young children. One of your correspondents, however, says that he knows that the Deerhound did assist the Alabama, and if he does know this he knows more than I do. As to the movements of the Deerhound before the action, all the movements with which I was acquainted were for the objects of enjoying the summer morning, and getting a good and safe place from which to watch the engagement. Another of your correspondents declares that since the affair it has been discovered that the Deerhound was a consort of the Alabama, and on the night before had received many valuable articles for safe-keeping from that vessel. This is simply untrue. Before the engagement neither I nor any of my family had any knowledge of or communication with Captain Semmes, any of his officers, or any of his crew. Since the fight I have enquired from my captain whether he or any of my crew had had any communication with the captain or crew of the Alabama prior to meeting them on the Deerhound after the engagement, and his answer, given in the most emphatic manner, has been 'None whatever.' As to the deposit of chronometers and other valuable articles, the whole story is a myth. Nothing was brought from the Alabama to the Deerhound, and I never heard of the tale until I saw it in an extract from your own columns. After the fight was over, the drowning men picked up, and the Deerhound steaming away to Southampton, some of the officers who had been saved began to express their acknowledgments for my services, and my reply to them, which was addressed also to all who stood around, was:—'Gentlemen, you have no need to give me any special thanks. I should have done exactly the same for the other people if they had needed it.' This speech would have been a needless, and indeed an absurd piece of hypocrisy, if there had been any league or alliance between the Alabama and the Deerhound.

Both your correspondents agree in maintaining that Captain Semmes and such of his crew as were taken away by the Deerhound are bound in honour to consider themselves still as prisoners, and to render themselves to their lawful captors as soon as practicable. This is a point which I have nothing to do with, and therefore I shall not discuss it. My object in this letter is merely to vindicate my conduct from misrepresentation; and I trust that in aiming at this I have not transgressed any of your rules of correspondence, and shall therefore be entitled to a place in your columns.—I am, &c.,

JOHN LANCASTER.

Hindley Hall, Wigan, June 27.

24 Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square,
London, June 21.

'Dear Sir,—I received from Captain Semmes at Southampton, where I had the pleasure to see you yesterday, a full report of the efficient service rendered under your orders, by the officers and crew of your yacht, the Deerhound, in rescuing him, with thirteen of his officers and twenty-seven of his crew, from their impending fate, after the loss of his ship.

Captain Semmes reports that, finding the Alabama actually sinking, he had barely time to despatch his wounded in his own boats to the enemy's ship, when the Alabama went down, and that nothing was left to those who remained on board but to throw themselves into the sea. Their own boats absent, there seemed no prospect of relief, when your yacht arrived in their midst and your boats were launched; and he impressively told me that to this timely and generous succour he, with most of his officers and a portion of his crew, were indebted for their safety. He further told me that on their arrival on board the yacht every care and kindness were extended to them which their exhausted condition required, even to supplying all with dry clothing.

I am fully aware of the noble and disinterested spirit which prompted you to go to the rescue of the gallant crew of the Alabama, and that I can add nothing to the recompense already received by you and those acting under you in the consciousness of having done as you would be done by; yet you will permit me to thank you, the captain, officers, and crew of the Deerhound, for this signal service—and to say that, in doing so, I but anticipate the grateful sentiment of my country and of the Government of the Confederate States. I have the honour to be, dear Sir, most respectfully and truly your obedient servant,

J. M. MASON.

John Lancaster, Esq., Hindley Hall, Wigan.

Hindley Hall, near Wigan, June 24.

Dear Sir,—I am in due receipt of your esteemed favour of the 21st inst., and am gratified to find that the timely aid we rendered with the yacht Deerhound to the gallant captain and officers and crew of the Alabama, has met with your approval. I shall always look back to that event with satisfaction, however much we may regret the result which necessitated my interference.—Yours very respectfully,

JOHN LANCASTER.

The Hon. J. M. Mason.

To Monsieur Bonfils.

U.S.S.S. Kearsage, Cherbourg, June 21.

Sir,—Certain pilot boats which I, from feelings of humanity, allowed to save several prisoners when the Alabama had gone down, took them into Cherbourg. These officers and sailors are not the less subject to the laws of war; they are my prisoners, and I demand that they come on board the Kearsage to surrender as such. If they should endeavour to free themselves from this obligation under cover of the means which have been used for their escape, they must expect to meet with no mercy another time.

JOHN A. WINSLOW, Captain.

M. Bonfils replied as follows:—

To Captain John A. Winslow,

Sir,—I have received your letter of June 21. Your demand is one which I have no power whatever to entertain, and should have been addressed to the French Government with whom these unfortunates have found a refuge. I know of no law of war to prevent a soldier from escaping from a field of battle after a reverse, even although he had been made prisoner, and I do not see why a sailor who saves himself by swimming should be in a worse case. I must therefore refuse to act as your go-between towards certain individuals, whom you do not even name, but whom you claim as prisoners. I cannot, moreover, understand how the authorities of the United States can pretend to hold prisoners in the territory of the French empire.

I am, &c.,

BONFILS.

(M. Bonfils was the agent for the Alabama while that vessel was in the port of Cherbourg.)

Punch gives the following deserved tribute to the heroism of the surgeon of the Alabama:—

On the previous Sunday morning, the Federal frigate, the Kearsage, and the Confederate frigate, the Alabama, near Cherbourg, when one man covered himself with honour which no one will contest, the brave Llewellyn, the Surgeon of the vanquished ship.

'Down to the deeps, in doing well, he went.'

He might have been saved, but he refused to imperil his wounded by increasing the number in their boat. It is not to the Wiltshire clergyman, the father, who must be so proud amid his grief, that Englishmen should leave the duty of erecting a memorial to a true hero. His name should have been mentioned by a speaker who has himself done brave things, Sir John Hay, when asking Clarence Paget whether Government had noted the artillery lesson to be learned from the fight off Cherbourg. It should be mentioned whenever there is talk of braver death than that met in the heat of battle.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.—Earl Russell, as will be seen from our Parliamentary report, referred on Monday night to the contingency of war with the United States. On Wednesday, the Times referred to the same subject in two leading articles. We subjoin an extract from each:—'The Americans, whether united or divided, will represent a great warlike Power, and they make no secret of their intention to exert their strength beyond the limits of their own world. It is certainly not impossible that the Federals, who have more than once threatened us with war already, should take advantage of our occupation at home to carry this menace into execution. That they have no complaint against us and that they have more than enough upon their hands may be true, but they are angry nevertheless, and might possibly proceed to measures to which we could not submit. But in this case also the means of retaliation would be in our hands. We should only have to recognise the South, and the war, already as much as the Federals can sustain, would become far heavier for them. If we but raised the blockade and admitted the Confederates to commerce with the world, it would be equivalent to doubling their resources and their strength. This the Americans so well know, that the North lives in constant fear and the South in constant hope of such an event. The idea of European intervention has haunted the Federals from the beginning of the war to the present time, and they would lose far more than they could gain by making it a reality. . . . . Canada has been exceedingly fortunate in the course which the American war has taken. Had the North succeeded in immediately conquering and overrunning the South, the wave that flowed thither would infallibly have recoiled upon Canada, and she, unarmed and unready, would certainly have been overwhelmed by its violence. Instead of tamely submitting to an Austrian Emperor in the South, Republican pride would have spurned the idea of a British colony in the North. But the Confederation has stood between us and this great danger. General Lee has fought our battles as well as his own, and a hundred bloody fields have swallowed up that fierce and, as they believed, invincible host which was destined to eradicate the last trace of British supremacy from the American Continent. As the contest continued, the forces of the two parties became more equal, and we may now indulge a hope that the termination of the Civil War, when it comes, will leave the North, whether victorious or vanquished, in a disposition rather to seek repose after its almost superhuman efforts than to rush on fresh adventures. Still this conclusion is by no means certain. The conclusion of the war may leave the Northern States in the possession of an army which they dare not disband and cannot conveniently employ, and that army may demand to be led against the untouched and flourishing province of Canada. It is quite possible that the North may seek on the St. Lawrence an indemnity for what it has lost on the Potomac.'

SPOILS OF THE BATTLE-FIELD.—On May 24, Colonel Baldwin, chief of ordnance for the army of General Lee, informed the Richmond Enquirer that the Confederates have secured eighteen thousand Federal muskets on the battle-fields in Spottsylvania, and four thousand in Chesterfield, in addition to five pieces of artillery, including three twenty-pound Parrotts and two Napoleons.

THE FEDERAL LOSS AT RESACA.—A correspondent of the Columbus Enquirer, writing from Ackworth, Georgia, on May 21, says: 'A Yankee lieutenant, whom our cavalry captured near Cassville, informed me that their loss at Resaca in the fights of Saturday and Sunday was 2,310 killed and died on the field, and 5,300 wounded. The large number killed in proportion to their wounded, is accounted for from the fact of their repeatedly assaulting our lines.'

CONFEDERATE OFFICIAL REPORTS.

THE following official despatches have been published :—

Head-quarters, Army Northern Virginia,
June 3—8.35 P.M.

Hon. Secretary of War,—About half-past four A.M. to-day the enemy made an attack upon the right of our line. In front of General Hoke and part of General Breckenridge's line he was repulsed without difficulty. He succeeded in penetrating a salient in General Breckenridge's line, and captured a portion of the battalion there posted. General Finnegan's brigade of Mahone's division, and the Maryland battalion of Breckenridge's command, immediately drove the enemy out with severe loss. Repeated attacks were made upon General Anderson's position, chiefly against his right, under General Kershaw. They were met with great steadiness, and repulsed in every instance. The attack extended to our extreme left, under General Early, with like results. Later in the day it was twice renewed against General Heth, who occupied Early's left, but was repulsed with loss. General Hampton encountered the enemy's cavalry near Hawes' Shop, and a part of General William H. F. Lee's division drove them from their entrenchments. Our loss to-day has been small, and our success, under the blessing of God, all that we could expect.

Respectfully,
R. E. LEE, General.

It is said that seven hundred dead and badly-wounded Yankees were counted in front of Hoke's line after the fight, and, what is more surprising, Hoke only had two men killed. From all accounts, the loss of the enemy on Friday could not have been less than six thousand killed and severely wounded.

Head-quarters, Army Northern Virginia,
June 4—8.30 P.M.

Hon. Secretary of War,—Last night, after the date of my despatch, Generals Breckenridge and Finnegan were attacked by the enemy as they were preparing to reestablish their skirmish line. The enemy was soon repulsed. Immediately afterwards an attack was made upon General Hoke's front, with a like result. Up to this time of writing, nothing has occurred along the lines to-day except skirmishing at various points. The position of the army is substantially unchanged.

Respectfully,
R. E. LEE, General.

GENERAL JOHNSTON'S ARMY.—The following general order is published in Confederate papers :—'General Orders. Soldiers of the Army of Tennessee,—You have displayed the highest qualities of the soldier—firmness in combat, patience under toils. By your courage and skill you have repulsed every assault of the enemy. By marches, by day and by night, you have defeated every attempt upon your communications, which are now secure. You will now march upon the foe to meet his advancing columns. Truly confiding in the conduct of the officers and the courage of the soldiers, I lead you to battle. We may confidently trust that the Almighty Father will reward the patriot's toils, and bless the Confederate banners. Cheered by the success of our brothers in Virginia and beyond the Mississippi, our efforts will equal theirs. Strengthened by His support, those efforts will be crowned with like success.—Jos. E. JOHNSTON, General.'

THE CAPTURE OF THE WATER WITCH.—The following official despatch has been received by the Confederate Secretary of the Navy :—'Savannah, June 3, 1864. Hon. S. R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy. Sir,—I have the honour to report that an expedition from my command, under Lieut. F. P. Pelot, Confederate States Navy, last night carried by boarding the United States steamer Water Witch, near Ossabaw Sound, after a hard fight. Our loss is the gallant Lieut. Pelot, Moses Dallas (coloured pilot), and three men killed; from ten to twelve wounded. I will telegraph you more in detail at the earliest moment.—I am, very respectfully, W. W. HUNTER, Flag Officer.'

THE DEFEAT OF GENERAL SIGEL.—The Staunton Spectator gives the following particulars :—'On Friday evening last the forces under command of General Imboden had a skirmish with the advance guard of Sigel's forces at Newmarket, in Shenandoah county, in which the enemy were driven back and a part of them captured, together with a number of horses. Ninety-five Yankees and two negroes (prisoners) arrived here on yesterday evening. At that time General Breckenridge was on the march from this place, on his way to reinforce General Imboden. He arrived in time on Saturday to form his line of battle about a mile south of Newmarket, and near the boundary line between the counties of Rockingham and Shenandoah, the position taken being in the county of Shenandoah. The enemy fell back, and the battle was fought on the north side of Newmarket. On Sunday the Dutch General, mit all dat fites mit Sigel, offered battle, and after a severe engagement was defeated, with the loss of a good many killed, wounded, and prisoners, and five pieces of artillery. They were pursued as far as the bridge across the North Shenandoah, near Mount Jackson, which the enemy partially destroyed, and thus stopped for the time the pursuit, as the river was too full to ford. The force of the enemy consisted of 5,000 infantry, 2,000 cavalry, and four batteries of artillery. The strength of our force it may not be prudent to state at this time, but it was sufficient to defeat and rout Sigel and all dat fites mit him.'

A WARNING TO FRANCE.—The New York Herald of June 12 writes : 'It must not be supposed that the people of this country will tamely submit to the violation of the Monroe doctrine, and that at the proper time they will not ignominiously expel the invaders of Mexico from this continent. The moment we have crushed the rebellion—and that is near at hand—we shall turn our attention to this matter, and shall be prepared to do so most effectively. With a powerful army and an immense fleet at our disposal, we shall not defer to France then, but most probably, with Grant at the head of affairs, move directly upon the enemy, and punish summarily their insolent intrusion upon this continent.'

KNAPSACKS DISCARDED.—Knapsacks have fallen into general disuse and discredit in the Confederate armies, and in derision of them the soldiers call them 'hand organs.' Whenever a company or regiment is seen marching with knapsacks slung, the taunt is sure to follow: 'I say, you've got your organs; where's your monkeys? You left them behind, expecting to find bigger and better monkeys down here.' A blanket and oil cloth twisted into the shape of a boa constrictor, and slung about the shoulders of the soldier, is the light equipment for heavy, rapid marching.—Wilmington Journal, June 1.

THE CONFEDERATE CURRENCY.

ON May 18 the Confederate Senate resumed consideration of a Bill to amend the Act of the last Session 'to reduce the currency, and to authorise the new issue of notes and bonds.'

After considerable discussion and some amendments, the Bill was passed in the following form :—

A Bill to amend an Act entitled, 'An Act to reduce the Currency and to authorise a new Issue of Notes and Bonds,' approved February 17, 1864.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact: That the amount of Treasury notes which shall be issued under the provisions of the Act of which this is an amendment shall not exceed one dollar of new issue for three dollars of the old issue, which may have been paid into the Treasury under the provisions of the said Act. Provided: That this limitation shall not be construed to restrict the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue new notes in exchange for old notes, held by individuals, at the rate of two dollars of the new issue for three dollars of the old issue, as provided for in the said Act. Provided further: That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, on January 1, 1865, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to reduce the amount of Treasury notes in circulation to two hundred millions; and when the circulation of said notes shall be thus reduced, the faith of the Government is hereby pledged that the same shall not be increased.

Section 2. Instead of the six per cent. bonds, authorised to be issued to the States under the twelfth section of the said Act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorised to issue to any State which may desire the same, one-half of such amount as the said State is entitled to claim in Treasury notes of the new issue, and the other half in said six per cent. bonds; or, at the option of the State, in coupon bonds, payable in twenty years, with interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly; the said four per cent. bonds not to be taxable either upon principal or interest, and this provision shall extend to any portion of the amount which such State may be entitled to claim.

Section 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is also authorised to issue to any person holding old issues of the Treasury notes, entitled to be exchanged for new issues, untaxable four per cent. bonds of the same character described in the section next preceding; and the exchange shall be made at the same rate at which the old notes may be exchanged for those of the new issue—that is to say, the holder of Treasury notes of the old issue shall be entitled to a four per cent. bond exempt from taxation, at a rate of two dollars of bonds for three dollars of notes. Provided: That on and after January 1, 1865, the authority to make the exchanges mentioned in this section shall cease and determine.

Section 4. Any holder of four per cent. bonds or certificates, issued under the first section of the Act of which this is an amendment, may exchange his bond or certificate for a four per cent. untaxable bond, such as is described in the section next preceding, at the same rate provided therein as to old issues, that is to say: at the rate of two dollars of untaxable bonds for three dollars of bonds or certificates issued under the said first section.

Section 5. The bonds and certificates mentioned in the second section of the Act to which this is an amendment, shall be receivable in payment of all Government dues which shall have accrued prior to January 1, 1865, except export and import duties; and transfer by delivery of said bonds and certificates shall be sufficient to enable the holder to use the same in payment of said Government dues.

Section 6. The bonds authorised by this Act shall be in such form, and shall have such authentication, as may be directed by regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury.

GOVERNOR BAYLEY.—If our readers will turn to our number of April 7 of this year, they will find a very interesting correspondence between Governor Bayley of the Bahama Islands, and the Duke of Newcastle, then Secretary for the Colonies. His Grace took occasion to express himself dissatisfied with certain statements made by Governor Bayley with regard to the blockade-running, and eventually informed him somewhat curtly that gentlemen in his position were not required to give their private opinions on political matters. Shortly after the exchange of this correspondence, Governor Bayley was relieved of his duties and recalled to England. His departure has called forth from the Legislative Assembly of the colony an address expressive of the high estimation in which His Excellency has been held during the seven years of his administration, a period which has been marked by many and great improvements in the commercial and political condition of the islands, at a time, too, when the civil war raging on the neighbouring continent was productive of the greatest excitement. 'They would fail in their duty were they not to express the opinion they entertain that His Excellency's prudence and great ability, combined with wise administrative tact, have tended materially to promote the order and prosperity which have characterised his administration.' The address concludes with a graceful compliment to Mrs. Bayley, who has won the affections of all classes. A similar address was presented by the House of Representatives, in which they express their cordial appreciation of His Excellency's devotedness to his duties, and his exemplary administrative talent. By his judicious policy as well as strenuous influence, many important measures have been consummated which have laid the foundation for the permanent prosperity of the Bahamas. Among these is mentioned the regular system of steam communication with the mother country, the United States, and the West Indies, whereby the islands have been brought into conspicuous notice, mercantile enterprise has been facilitated, and private as well as public prosperity promoted. In the course of his reply to this address, the Governor says: 'It is my firm conviction that, although the colony has considerably advanced of late years, it has not yet reached that point of eminence to which, by a judicious use of its natural resources, it may yet attain. It is, I think, a matter of mutual congratulation that measures concerted or completed since my accession to this Government have enabled the colony to profit largely by occurrences which no human sagacity could have foreseen, and no special legislation could have produced.' It is evident that in Governor Bayley the Bahama Islands have lost a sincere and valuable friend. We can easily sympathise with their regret, decorously veiled in acquiescence to the will of the Home Government, but none the less evidently existing; the late Colonial Secretary is open to the charge of having removed a valuable officer from a position which he had long and ably filled on the weakest possible grounds. Governor Bayley is another of the many diplomatic victims offered up by our Foreign and Colonial Offices to the Moloch of Northern irritability.

THE FIRST TWENTY DAYS OF GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

A GENTLEMAN of high position in the Confederate Government thus describes, in a private letter to a friend in Europe, the operations of the armies in Virginia from the 4th to the 24th May :—

RICHMOND, May 25.—On the 4th of this month Grant's forces, then massed in Culpepper County, crossed the Rapidan on the right flank of General Lee, in the hope of reaching the road leading to Richmond in advance of Lee, and thus cutting off the latter from the capital. Lee, however, by a rapid march to his right, struck Grant's advance in flank, and forced him to stop his march, to change front, and to deliver battle in the district of country known as the Wilderness. Lee held his position against the repeated and desperate assaults of Grant's whole force, and inflicted such terrible losses on the latter, that he was compelled to withdraw his whole reserve corps (Burnside's) from the north side of the Rapidan, where it had remained to guard the enemy's depôt of supplies. This compelled a removal of the supplies in part and the destruction of the remainder. Grant, finding himself unable to force Lee's lines, then moved his army down the Rapidan in the direction of Fredericksburg and Spottsylvania Court House, changing his base to Fredericksburg, building bridges across the Rappahannock there, and rebuilding the railroad to Acquia Creek so as to establish a new communication for his supplies. The Rappahannock runs south-easterly, and the movement of Grant thus brought him to a point nearer to Richmond in the number of miles, but not an inch nearer than he could have got without fighting. This forced change of his base was claimed as a victory by the Yankees, although they admitted a loss of from 27,000 to 35,000 men in getting to a point which they could have reached unopposed.

As soon as Lee became satisfied of Grant's movement, he made a forced march to Spottsylvania Court House to place his army again between Grant and Richmond. This pursuit of Grant by Lee was claimed by Grant to be a retreat! because it brought Lee nearer to Richmond, owing to the course of the rivers as above explained. On arriving at Spottsylvania Court House, our advance found the enemy had arrived there just before them. An assault was immediately made on Hancock's corps, which occupied the Court House: it was supported by two divisions of cavalry. The enemy were driven out with great slaughter, and Lee established his lines again in front of Grant, who was thus defeated in his attempt to edge himself between Lee and Richmond. Grant then, finding that he could not get by Lee's army, commenced a series of tremendous assaults with his overwhelming masses, hurling them directly on Lee's lines and seeking to pierce them by mere weight of numbers and obstinate repetition of attack with progressive columns of fresh troops. His desperate assaults were met with the steady and cool resistance of veterans confident in themselves and their leader, and resulted in the slaughter of a number of the enemy unparalleled in this whole war: the least calculation gives the losses in these assaults at 30,000, while many believe them to have reached 45,000.

Again disappointed, beaten, and baffled, Grant renewed his former strategy of moving suddenly down the river, and made a fresh attempt to turn Lee's right; but the eye of our incomparable leader was upon him. A reconnaissance in force was made; it was found that Grant's lines were held by a mere fringe of skirmishers, and that he was moving to our right. Lee, thereupon, at once withdrew his army to Hanover Junction to confront Grant on any new line he may select, and it is probable we shall know to-day whether Grant will continue his former desperate attacks on Lee in front, or whether he will abandon his new base of Fredericksburg and seek a third one at West Point. The latter would be his best, but the objection is, that he would thus be forced to begin afresh at the very point from which M'Clellan began his advance in 1862, and would thus be driven to the acknowledgment that M'Clellan's was a superior and more sagacious campaign. Thus Grant, with an army beaten and reduced more than half, would have to start afresh from a position which he might have taken at the opening of his operations without the loss of a man.

Our losses have been so small comparatively as to be scarcely credible. But it must be remembered that for the first time the army of Northern Virginia has received assaults in entrenched lines. General Lee, with consummate judgment, knowing how enormously he was outnumbered, and appreciating the peculiar character of his foe, received him just as an adroit fencer receives the rush of a burly giant :—

and bled at every pore. Our total losses sum up about 12,000 men, against at least 70,000 put hors de combat in Grant's army.

On the south side, Beauregard has Butler penned up in a little peninsula, where he lies safe under cover of his gunboats. Everything looks as cheerful as possible.

THE YANKEE ARMY.—The Richmond Sentinel of May 23 says : 'The captives brought to Richmond present a miserable appearance, and are the representatives of nearly every nation on the face of the globe. Had not the Yankees procured recruits from Europe, the war would have been ended long ago. We have been fighting the people of the United States and all "the rest of mankind," and when this war is closed, and our independence achieved, we can truthfully declare that we have withstood the world in arms.'

AN IRONCLAD YANKEE.—One of the Yankee colonels, received at the Libby from the south side, had his front and rear protected by a patent breast and back-plate, manufactured out of steel, and reputed to be bullet-proof. The colonel confessed that he considered his rear in more danger than his front, especially when it came to running, and, expecting to have some of that to do, provided himself accordingly.—Richmond Examiner, May 20.

SKEDADDLING.—The Journal, a paper published in Alexandria, says that on the 19th fifteen officers and three hundred men, all of them skedaddlers from the army of General Grant, were forwarded to Belle Plain to be returned to their regiments. The officers were marched in the rear of their men, and a portion of them handcuffed together. The Journal adds: 'A sad but just example.'—Richmond Enquirer, May 30.

WORK DONE IN COLUMBUS.—The Columbus Sun states that in the Quartermaster's department in that city, under the control of Major F. W. Dillard, the following amount of work has been done since October 1861: shoes, 305,065; jackets, 263,922; pants, 290,092; shirts, 116,146; drawers, 82,948; caps, 122,441; also amount of leather received and disbursed, 632,577 pounds.

The Fight at Dallas.—The Memphis Appeal, published at Atlanta, Georgia, published the following on May 27: 'The city yesterday was in commotion from the sound of cannon which echoed in the ears of the people, at every point in the suburbs, away from the noise of the busy centre. New Hope church, situated on the road from Powder Spring to Dallas, and about four miles from the latter place, was the point where the advancing army of Johnston came upon the enemy. Hood's corps on our right was the first that opened fire on Wednesday afternoon about two o'clock, and parts only of Stevenson's and Hindman's divisions were engaged. The whole of the army at this time were moving upon the enemy, and as our skirmishers advanced the Yankees threw out a large force in their front. The troops that were up formed in a single line of battle, behind which our skirmishers gradually receded. The enemy were distinctly observed to have four lines of battle, and between three and five o'clock in the afternoon, they made two distinct and heavy charges upon our line. They were repulsed with great slaughter on both occasions, and with small loss to our troops. Brigadier-General Cumming, we learn, was severely wounded by a ball which entered the breast and came out at the arm. Brigadier-General Reynolds was slightly wounded in the arm, and is now in this city. After the second charge of the enemy, the contest lulled for the night. A private note written at General Johnston's head-quarters, at sunrise yesterday morning, says, "The affair yesterday was a handsome little thing. This morning the enemy have just opened again."'

The Federal Losses on June 3.—The Richmond Sentinel of June 6 says: 'It is said that seven hundred dead and badly-wounded Yankees were counted in front of Hoke's line after the fight, and, what is more surprising, Hoke only had two men killed. From all accounts, the loss of the enemy on Friday could not have been less than six thousand killed and severely wounded.

Sinking a Federal Alabama.—A correspondent of the Houston (Texas) Telegraph writes from Matagorda that the Federal gunboats Alabama and Estelle attacked the Confederate States gunboat J. F. Carr, and, after a fight of two hours and a half, were signally repulsed. The Alabama was struck below the water line on the port side, and retired in a sinking condition.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

The Bank rate of discount remains at 6 per cent., and as there continue to be withdrawals of specie for transmission abroad, whilst there is not any going in to the establishment, and, moreover, as the last weekly returns proved unfavourable, there is no prospect of any further reduction at present. The enquiry for money both at the Bank and amongst the brokers is very full, but without any undue pressure. There is a good supply of capital in the market; but it is not parted with even for prime short-dated paper under the Bank minimum, and in some instances even higher terms are enforced. The Joint Stock Banks are also demanding high rates for advances; but under present circumstances they are doing very little indeed, and show no disposition to press business. On the Stock Exchange there is also a good supply of money, and short loans on Government Securities are negotiated at 5 to 5½ per cent. Within the last day or two the enquiry has been stimulated by the settlement of the accounts in Foreign Stocks, Railway and miscellaneous Shares, but the rates for continuation have been exceedingly light.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities shows increased depression as regards both the business transacted, as well as prices. In fact, with one or two exceptions, there have not been dealings in any of the securities. The only official quotations have been in Erie, $100 shares at 51, 50, 52, and 50. Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at 36½, 37½, 37¼, 37, 37¼, and 36 dis. and in ditto ditto, all paid, at 59.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

We have the pleasure of being able to state, with positive certainty, that the semi-annual interest and dividend of sinking fund due on September 1, and which by the terms of the contract with the Confederate Government, must be deposited with the contractors 60 days in advance, is ready for deposit. This fact, coupled with the continued absorption of large quantities of the bonds by conversion into cotton-certificates for blockade-running purposes will no doubt give a vigorous stimulus to transactions in this stock.

The dealings in this Stock have been limited this week—the price being steadily maintained at 63 to 65. This afternoon, the price declined slightly—we close 62 to 64.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Although there has not been a extensive business transacted in the English stock market, the gloom which pervaded all departments till the actual result of the Conference on the Germano-Danish question, and which had tended to depress prices, was made known, was partially removed, when it was officially announced that this country was not to engage in the war. The operators once more became rather active and prices gradually improved, the market closing with a firm tendency. Consols being 90 to ⅛ ex div. for money, and 90⅛ to 90¼ for the account, which is an improvement on the week of ¼ per cent. Exchequer bills continued very steady at 8s. to 3s. dis. for the March issue, and for those of June 5s. dis. to par. The Foreign Stock Market has been subjected to precisely the same influences as the other departments; but as these stocks offer a better opportunity for speculation, the recovery in prices has been proportionately greater. The advance in Mexican has been 1¼ per cent., in Greek and Spanish Passives each ⅜ per cent., and in the Spanish Certificates about ⅛ per cent. Turkish descriptions have also been fairly dealt in, but without alteration in values. The closing quotations this evening were: Greek, at 24 to 24¼; Mexican, 44⅝ to 44⅞; Spanish Passives, 29⅝ to 30; and the Certificates 9⅞ to 10⅛; Turkish six per cents. of 1854, 90½ to 90¾; and those of 1862 at 70⅞ to 71.

Liverpool, Wednesday, June 29.—There has been much greater activity displayed in our cotton market during the last few days than for some time past. In the early part of the week there was not quite so much briskness, and prices showed a declining tendency. With the improvement in business, however, there has also been a corresponding advance in quotations. There is still an active demand for American cotton, the supplies of which are at present very fair. Egyptian, Brazil, and Surat have also been in good request, but there has not been so much enquiry for Sea Islands, and China and Japans. The sales this week have been 44,000 bales, of which 15,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,295,896 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 1,031,530 bales. There have been imported this year 1,096,862 bales, and to the corresponding date last year 713,416 bales. The exports this year have been 246,510 bales; to the same in 1863, 219,705 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 820,394 bales; to the same period last year 552,873 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 211,256 bales; same in 1863, 212,536 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 310,486 bales, and to the corresponding period last year 363,149 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon, were: American descriptions, 27½d to 29½d; Pernambuco, 29¼d. to 29¾d.; Maranham, 29¼d. to 29¾d., Macao, 28d.; Bahia, 28d. to 28¼d.; Egyptian, 28¼d. to 32½d.; Smyrna, 21⅛d. to 25½d.; Surat, 12¼d. to 23¾d.; Bengal, 17¼d. to 17½d.; Scinde, 17¼d. to 17½d.; China, 18¼d. to 20¼d.; Japan, 21d.; and Peruvian, 27¾d. to 30d.

The Manchester markets have been dull and heavy throughout the greater part of the week, in consequence of the uncertainty which prevailed with regard to the Germano-Danish question; but since the statements in Parliament on Monday, public feeling has been rather quieted, and, for the present, operators know what they have to depend upon. Nevertheless, although there is a little more cheerfulness exhibited, the actual resumption of hostilities prevents anything like a display of activity. In shipping yarns, within the last day or two, there has been rather more doing for the chief markets, and an advance has been established of about ¼d., and in some few instances ½d. per lb., compared with what spinners would have accepted a day or two ago. The market closed rather firm, and buyers seemed more disposed to enter into engagements than for some time past. In home trade yarns there has also been a better market, and for some of the better kinds a slight advance has also been obtained. There has been rather more enquiry as to the prices which manufacturers are prepared to accept, both for goods in stocks and as to orders for the future, but it has not led to much actual business. The only sales effected have been in retail quantities. Manufactures continue very firm, and there is no change to quote in prices from last week.

Derived from Authentic Sources.
BY HIS PERSONAL FRIEND AND CHIEF OF STAFF TO HIS CORPS, PROFESSOR R. L. DABNEY, D.D., OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.
WITH ADDITIONS BY REV. W. CHALMERS, A.M.

Dr. Dabney has been selected to write this memoir by the General's widow and friends; by his successor and devoted comrade Lieutenant-General Ewell; and by the advice of the service in general. All the materials in the hands of his widow and relations have been placed at the disposal of Dr. Dabney, and unlimited access to the Papers of the Confederate War Department has been granted to him.
The First Volume brings the memoir down to the Battle of Bull Run; the Second Volume, concluding the work, is in preparation.

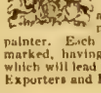
HUBBUCK'S PATENT WHITE ZINC PAINT.



THE most durable and beautiful paint known, is cheaper than White Lead, and is proved to be superior for all purposes than the pernicious Lead Paint, and equally adapted for all climates. Its whiteness is unaffected by bilge water, boiling sugar, or noxious gases. It is free from any poisonous ingredient, and suited in all respects to the use of the painter. Each Cask of Pure White Zinc is Stamped 'HUBBUCK, LONDON PATENT.' Inferior Zinc Paint, so marked, having been sold in Foreign Markets, the Patentees offer a Reward of FIFTY POUNDS for information which will lead to the conviction, in an English or Colonial Court, of those who have pirated their Mark. Both Exporters and Retailers are liable for its sale.

FEDERAL FINANCES.

NEW YORK: June 21, 1864.

The military bills and the appropriation bills for the spending of money are pretty well through. The financial measures for supplying the means are still incomplete. Neither the Tariff Bill nor the Internal Tax Bill has yet become a law. They are still hanging between the two Houses, which have disagreed on very numerous amendments. The differences are not such, however, as to endanger the passage of either Bill. Both will become laws in a few days; the principal question is, whether either or both will answer the purposes of the Government in furnishing means for the Treasury and reinstating the public credit.

The Tariff Bill is born a failure. The wants of the Government from this source, principally for the payment of the interest on the public debt in gold, were set down at $120,000,000 a year. The manufacturing interests got control of the Committees, and the Bill came forth a full protective measure; and all the efforts of the Opposition in both Houses have failed to break down the combinations by which revenue has been sacrificed for the benefit of the iron, cotton, and woollen interests of the Eastern States and Pennsylvania. Duties have been imposed largely and principally in order to protect domestic manufactures, and have so impaired the revenue capacity of the Bill, that it is not expected by men familiar with the operations of commerce, that it will produce over sixty millions of dollars, one-half of the estimated necessities of the Government for gold. The Government itself must, in the course of the next session, call for a revision, and the controversy will be reopened much to the disadvantage of the manufacturers, who have made the country's distresses the opportunity of fastening again an odious and repudiated system on the commercial policy of the country. The complaints against New England management are deep if not loud. The debates and divisions show something of this, but it is not half expressed, for the Yankees have cunningly managed to make the support of their schemes a hateful necessity. Men dare not face the responsibility of throwing out a Bill without which the Government alleges that it will be bankrupt. But this greediness is unwise. It leaves a financial necessity for an early revision, and the reopening of the whole controversy when the restraints under which the agricultural interest now acts shall have been removed, and the Western men speak out all they think of New England and her politics, which, having by their intolerant fanaticism made the war, contrive by sordid legislation to get rich upon it, and to cast the weight of the burdens on the drained and impoverished West. There is a fierce quarrel brewing between the East and the West, not confined to political parties. A large portion of the Western population begin to hate the name of Yankee almost as bitterly as they do that of rebel, and, if the war were over in any way, would infinitely rather consort with a Southerner than a New Englander. The tariff wrong and imposition is another grievance garnered up; and in the chances of the early future you must not be surprised to find the exasperation breaking out in a more dangerous form than a vote in Congress, to cut down an odious law made to enrich New England capitalists.

The Internal Tax Bill is another experiment of which the financial failure is predicted. Its authors are afraid of it, and have prudently so arranged it that its operation will not be felt until after the Presidential election. It is a subject of anxious thought among the fundholders, and all who have anything to lend in the present rage of the Government to borrow from anybody and at almost any rate which can tempt men to part with their money, whether these taxes can be collected at all under the furious political excitements they will provoke, or whether the sum of what may be collected can in any event save the Government from bankruptcy. It is certain that neither of these Bills is of any present use, and yet the wants of the Treasury were never greater or more pressing.

Last month I gave you some statements of the financial condition of the United States, derived from the official publications of the Treasury up to the middle of May. The Secretary has been in trouble ever since, and is now engaged in attempting by a change of policy, or rather some ineffectual undertakings to change a policy that will prove to have become too strong for his control, to stave off impending bankruptcy. The expedients by which he has been carrying on the Government—borrowing by issuing and reissuing Government paper without limit—have made a Government dollar barely represent fifty cents. His proffered loans for absorbing the paper have been unable to keep up with increasing war expenditures, which make new issues constantly necessary; and the want of decided military successes disturbs men's minds with the fear that the Government may never be able to pay, and that a discontented and overburdened people may refuse to pay.

Official statements have lately appeared giving precise details of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the first three quarters of the present fiscal year—that is, from July 1, 1863, to March 31, 1864, inclusive. These are the actual transactions at the Treasury, and do not take into the account unpaid liabilities, suspended accounts, or even audited claims and overdue requisitions.

By these tables the payments of the Treasury for those three quarters were . . .	$619,549,540
The whole receipts into the Treasury from all sources of revenue were . . .	161,691,931
Excess of payments	$457,857,609

These receipts were mainly from duties on imports ($73,413,193), and internal tax ($72,547,956); and $12,500,000 were received as commutation money for exemptions from the draft.

It must be noted that, besides the arrearages for unpaid requisitions and suspended accounts, and claims against the general Government for the regular war services, there is a huge mass of contingent individual and State claims requiring the action of the Departments and of Congress. Of these Mr. Whiting, the solicitor of the War Department, has lately written, in a published letter, that they amount already to 'hundreds of millions of dollars,' and that 'the army of claimants is really quite as formidable to the Government as the army of rebels.' Nevertheless, they are claims which are to be examined, and they are large enough to make it certain that they will be allowed, and if anything is paid they will be paid. Great claims in which so many are interested, and which can afford to bribe high, always succeed; it is only the small claimants, who depend on justice and good faith, that exhaust themselves in the effort and fail. These sums are to be counted in the ultimate amount of the debt. The figures I have quoted are sufficient to show to what straits the Government is reduced, exceeding its whole income, in the discharge of obligations that it could not postpone, by $457,857,000 in three quarters of a year, or at a rate exceeding $600,000,000 per annum.

Another table has been carefully prepared from the official publications of the Department, which shows the increase of the acknowledged public debt, and the paper issues which represent it, from June 1863 up to May 1864. I furnished you in a late letter with a full statement of the debt on May 14, and there has not been, and it is thought to be a little singular that there has not been, any authenticated report from the Department since of the actual amount of the debt. It is only reckoned by estimates and averages, which vary from $1,860,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. The latter is much the nearer to the fact, and itself represents only the liquidated and recognised debt, not all the actual liabilities which will go to make up the final sum. These figures, which serve to show the steady increase of the legal tender issues, are significant now, in view of the Secretary's confession of the desperate condition into which they have brought the Treasury.

The positive increase from June 10 to May 14 (11 months) was from $407,839,045 to $685,944,827 (about $278,000,000). The increase since the commencement of this Congress is this:—

The issues were,	May 14, 1864 . .	$685,944,827
"	" Dec. 1, 1863 . .	436,255,931
	Increase .	$249,688,896

or over $35,000,000 a month.

Gold has accordingly risen, as compared with paper, to nearly two for one, and to-day is over 200, a dollar in gold being worth nearly two in paper, and prices of all things rising with the inflation; the Government frightfully increasing its expenses, and straining itself to borrow everywhere in paper, to be repaid hereafter in gold at two for one.

The Congress has just given Mr. Chase one of his favourite measures for improving the value of this paper by beating down what he chooses to pronounce the 'speculative' price of gold. The Gold Bill becomes a law to-day, by which it is made penal—

To purchase or sell gold coin, bullion, or exchange, in any other place than at the office of business of one of the parties; to sell gold or silver, coin or bullion, except delivered at the time of sale, and paid for then by actual delivery of the lawful money; or to purchase or sell exchange for delivery within two days, or after ten days, from the date of contract. The penalty is fine and imprisonment, and the informer gets half the fine.

Gold rose one per cent. after the news yesterday of the passage of the Bill, but that might have been aided by the unfavourable war news. No man of observation or experience in business can fail to perceive that the effect of the Bill will be to embarrass free operations in gold and enhance the price, and that another effect will be to demonstrate the charlatanism of the department from which such egregious follies emanate.

The accumulation of distresses has driven Mr. Chase into the abandonment, in profession and promise at least, of his favourite theory of saving money to the Government by borrowing without interest—that is, by the unlimited issue of paper currency. He has been trying to borrow directly with his (5 per cent.) ten-forty loan, and it is a total failure. The subscriptions would not half pay the daily excess of his issues. His latest effort was to effect a loan of $75,000,000 at 6 per cent., payable in gold, the principal repayable after 1881 also in gold, and inviting proposals, for which he expected liberal bids, for money is very abundant, hunting for safe investments. The amount of offers was only $61,000,000, and the rates were such that he rejected all offers below 104 for 100 of stock. He has obtained $44,000,000 at an average of a fraction over 105. In other words, the capitalists of the United States have measured the credit of their own Government at about 53 cents for the dollar, and decline lending except at a rate which will pay more than 10 per cent. for their money, and return them, at the end of the loan, nearly two dollars for one.

The next expedient of the Secretary, as it is now given out in the money circles here, is to invite money from abroad by negotiating loans to be taken in Europe at the best rates to be had there. He is expected in New York to-day to engineer this through by the aid of foreign bankers here. It is a desperate thought, in which it may be doubted whether a little present success might not be a speedier way to ruin than absolute failure. They will be very bold men who trust their money to a Government of which its own most zealous supporters have shown such manifest distrust—which has already spent more than one-fourth of the estimated value of all the property of the country, real and personal, nearly $4,000,000,000 of the $1,350,000,000, which was the assessed value of all the property of the loyal States in 1863, in a war for destroying the productive capacity and wasting the resources on which its ability to pay depends—and which goes on blindly heaping up debts on a discontented people, without faith that they will certainly be able to pay, and with many misgivings that they may be more than willing to refuse to pay. The Englishman or the German who takes these risks, cannot be without warning of what he undertakes when he speculates at such enormous rates on the credit which the very terms of his loan show to be already shattered.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

FOR nearly two days it was believed in New York that the Federals had captured Petersburg. The journals came out with congratulatory leaders, in which wonder was expressed that General Lee should permit his enemy to change his base without opposition, and should have allowed Petersburg to be taken by surprise. But, as is so frequently the case, the sanguine Northerners were discounting a forged victory. On June 17, Grant's whole army was before Petersburg, and he succeeded in capturing a portion of the outer defences, with 450 prisoners and four cannon. Next day, soon after sunrise, a general assault was delivered by the Federals against the inner line of defences, and this was repulsed, and, as is usual under such circumstances, with heavy loss. After an interval of a few hours, that is, at midday, the Federals made another assault and were again repulsed with heavy loss. Undaunted by the carnage, Grant at four o'clock ordered a third assault, and for the third time that day his soldiers were repulsed with heavy loss. It is admitted that the Federal loss was 8,000, and that Hancock's corps alone lost 4,200. It is supposed that this official statement is exceptionally false as to the actual extent of the casualties sustained in these assaults.

From the 18th to the 21st, the Federal commander was quiet, and on the latter day commenced what Mr. Stanton describes as an 'important movement, which cannot be made public.' Whatever may have been the object of this movement it was not made without fighting. Whilst on the march, Grant was so harassed by General Hill's corps, that he ordered forward his whole army to give battle. When he came up with the Confederates, he found them occupying a formidable and entrenched position. During that night (Tuesday, 21st), the Federals got no rest, no matter how sorely they needed it. The Federal left was engaged throughout the night, and lost heavily in killed and wounded, and four cannon.

Next day (Wednesday, 22nd), the Federals sustained a serious disaster. General Hill forced his way between the second and sixth corps of the Federal army, attacked the second in the rear and drove it from its entrenchments, with a loss of 3,000 killed, wounded, and captured. The Confederates then retired to a strong position.

ON the 21st an assault was made on the Federal position at the White House by General Fitzhugh Lee, and the Federals were only saved from defeat by the aid of their gunboats.

Sheridan, who set out to join Hunter, has returned without effecting his object. He admits that he was defeated at Gordonsville on June 12, though the Administration previously claimed that engagement as a Federal victory. All we know about General Hunter is that he appeared near Lynchburg on June 16 and 17; that he was repulsed on the 18th in an attack on that place, and that he lost a large number of prisoners in retreating from Lynchburg to Liberty.

From two facts we gather that the Northerners take a gloomy view of the situation in Virginia. Gold is quoted in New York at 120 per cent. premium; and a rumour is current that the Northern army is making a retrograde movement, or is retreating.

GENERAL GRANT has blockaded the James River below Fort Darling with sunken vessels. He has done this, it is said, lest Confederate rams should come out and damage his transports. We will not presume to question the prudence of the Northern commander, but it is a little curious for an invader to block up the road to the city which it is his object to capture.

UNDER date of June 22, it is reported from the 'Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,' that 'the 3rd Excelsior Regiment, Colonel Leonard commanding, leave here to-morrow for home, their term of service having expired. This regiment participated in all the battles of the Peninsula under General M'Clellan, and, with the exception of Antietam, in all those in which the army of the Potomac has been engaged.'

GENERAL SHERMAN reported that the Confederate army was retreating, and that he was marching on Marietta. Subsequently he notified to Mr. Stanton that his report was not true, and that his officers had made a mistake about the retreat of the Confederate army. At latest dates Sherman was still entrenched, and was confronted by General Johnston. The Federal rear was harassed, and an assault on a division of Johnston's army had been repulsed with great slaughter. The Federal authorities manifest considerable anxiety as to Sherman's position.

THE explanation of the somewhat mysterious announcement in the telegraphic news about five Confederate generals being placed under fire off Charleston harbour, as a measure of retaliation, is explained by the following letter of the Commander of the Confederate forces in that city to the Commander of the United States forces:—

Head-quarters, Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, Charleston, June 13, 1864.—General,—Five generals and forty-five field officers of the United States army, all of them prisoners of war, have been sent to this city for safe keeping. They have been turned over to Brigadier-General Ripley, commanding the First Military District of the Department, who will see that they are provided with commodious quarters in a part of the city occupied by non-combatants, the majority of whom are women and children. It is proper, however, that I should inform you that it is a part of the city which for many months has been exposed day and night to the fire of your guns.—Very respectfully, your obedient servant, SAM. JONES, Major-General Commanding.—Major-General J. G. Foster, commanding United States forces on coast of South Carolina, C. S.

To this General Foster replies by a laboured attempt to vindicate his firing upon an inhabited part of the city, where no military results could possibly be obtained, and concludes with the threat that he would keep 'in positions exposed to the fire' of the Confederate guns an equal number of prisoners of like grade.

MR. STANTON reports the death of General Polk, but later advices do not mention it; therefore, the report, as it stands, is not worth consideration.

A RESOLUTION has been introduced in the Federal House of Representatives recommending that the President be authorised to give notice to Great Britain of the termination of the treaty which was made in 1817, by which the naval forces of Great Britain and the United States on the Northern lakes were strictly limited.

MEETINGS have been held in Washington and New York to ratify the nomination of the Baltimore Convention. At these gatherings the speeches were of the usual character. At Washington the resolutions were moved by Judge Kelley, who said that Mr. Lincoln 'should carry on the war until the rebellion is closed and its leaders sleep the quiet sleep of death in felons' graves.' Senator Lane followed. He said: 'Patriotism has become religion. . . . . The eternity of God's truth rested in the principles enunciated in the Baltimore Convention. It was full of the grand utterances of the Sermon on the Mount, and of the grand utterances of the Declaration of Independence. He was glad to endorse these principles, and to preach righteousness to all nations, beginning here at Jerusalem. . . . . This nation, after devoting a short time to the suppression of the rebellion, would be in a condition to assert the Monroe doctrine, and to make those frog-eating Frenchmen leave Mexico on the double-quick.' These sentiments were loudly applauded.

The New York meeting began with a practical letter from Mr. Seward, who wrote, 'For the present let the people send men and supplies to the national armies in the field.' The conclusion of the meeting was, however, sensational. Mr. S. Mathews, the last speaker, said—we quote literally from the report in the New York Herald of June 16—'There were more rebels North than in the South, and more rebels in this city than in the army of Jeff. Davis. Draw the line between the men who sustain the flag and the mean lickspittles. If you knew what secession was, it would shock you. It was begot in a lie; a lie its dam; its whole career stinking with rottenness, meanness, corruption, with all the villanies of human society. It will be with its hand on the Bible, with its lips upon the cross, with the sepulchre of the Saviour beneath its gaze—it is the vilest of all crimes. But still, as God suffered Christ to die for the regeneration and disenthralment of the human race from sin, so in this latter time will he lift the land from national crime and make the people once more free, prosperous and happy. These Peace Democrats of your State are the vilest living race; and if God has a slumbering thunderbolt left, he will let it fall upon the heads of these scoundrels.'

THE proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the abolition of slavery failed in the House of Representatives, not receiving the requisite two-thirds of the votes. Commenting on this, the New York World of June 17 observes: 'Two years' more experience of our accumulating burdens may make the Northern people unanimous in a willingness that the South should come back by a simple resumption of allegiance. It would be inopportune and unfortunate if, just at that moment, we found ourselves bound, hand and foot, in the strong fetters of a newly-adopted constitutional prohibition, and compelled to refuse a submission which we would, if at liberty, gladly accept.' It is true that at any moment the South would have been gladly received back into the Union upon any terms she chose to impose. But the South is fighting for that which is incompatible with reunion on any terms—she is fighting for independence.

MR. LINCOLN visited the Sanitary Fair at Philadelphia on June 16, and made a speech, in which he said: 'I have never been in the habit of making predictions in regard to the war, but I am almost tempted to make one. If I were to hazard it, it is this: That Grant is this evening with General Meade and General Hancock, of Pennsylvania, and the brave officers and soldiers with him, in a position from whence he will never be dislodged until Richmond is taken, and I have but one single proposition to put now, and perhaps I can best put it in the form of an interrogative. If I shall discover that General Grant and the noble officers and men under him can be greatly facilitated in their work by a sudden pouring forward of men and assistance, will you give them to me? Then, I say, stand ready, for I am watching for the chance.' The world does not agree with Mr. Lincoln as to facts. The general impression is, that he has made very many, and utterly false, predictions.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM has returned to Ohio, and been elected a delegate to the Chicago Convention. The Federal Government is perplexed. If they permit a banished man to return with impunity, it will be a damaging confession of weakness and pusillanimity. To arrest Mr. Vallandigham would be a dangerous proceeding. In the last few months Ohio and other Western States have manifested considerable disloyalty to the Lincoln dynasty. Since Mr. Vallandigham's banishment, much more 'treasonable' utterances than his have been heard in Congress, and have gone unpunished. Even Republican papers are teeming with charges against the Administration vastly more 'treasonable' than anything Mr. Vallandigham uttered. Probably the Federal Government will do nothing, at least not until the Presidential election is over. When Mr. Lincoln has secured a new lease of power, he will not fail to punish his enemies.

ON June 8 there was a discussion in the Federal Senate on the repeal of the commutation clause by which persons drafted are, by the payment of $300, exempted from service. Mr. Wilson, in reply to an attack on the Government made by Mr. Conness, of California, said: 'Does the senator know that we have raised or reenlisted, since October 17 last, six hundred thousand men, not to count black men, and that within the last year we have put in the field seven hundred thousand men; that we have made an exertion such as few nations ever made and few nations can make; that we have spent $125,000,000 in bounties; that we have drafted; that we have used the whole power and influence of the Government to increase our military forces? Sir, we have put forth an effort that excites the astonishment and commands the admiration of the world; yet the senator from California, whose constituents are not drafted nor called upon, rises to-day and rebukes the Administration—rebukes us, and talks glibly of the timid counsels of men who are quite as hopeful, determined, and brave as himself. . . . We have sent forty-eight thousand men to reinforce General Grant since the commencement of the march towards the rebel capital. Within thirty days we have gathered up over the country these reinforcements, two thousand of whom are the one hundred days' men raised in the State of Ohio. . . . The Government is casting a drag-net over the country, gathering up all the soldiers it can, and hurrying them forward to the support of General Grant.' This statement shows what tremendous exertions the Federal Government has made to get recruits. The observation about California is not quite accurate. The only reason why the people of California have not been driven into Mr. Lincoln's slaughter-pens is, that they disregarded the calls and effectually resisted the draft. Indeed, California is practically independent. She neither contributes to Mr. Lincoln's armies, nor will she make use of Mr. Chase's greenbacks.

THE Chicago (Democratic) Convention has been put off until August 29. By so doing, the Democrats will be assisted by the events of the next two months to guide them in their choice of a President. They may not gain, but they cannot lose by postponement.

MR. ISAAC HENDERSON, who was publisher of the New York Evening Post, an ultra-republican journal, and also United States Navy Agent of the port of New York, has been dismissed from Government employment, and arrested by Marshal Murray on charges of fraud, bribery, falsification of vouchers, and other misdemeanours. This affair followed closely upon Mr. Thurlow Weed's letter on official corruption. We have commented on this exposure in our leading columns.

MR. LINCOLN'S officers have peculiar views about the use of voting. It will be remembered that in New Orleans it was decreed that those who did not vote at all were to be treated as enemies, and that those who did vote were to support the Government candidate under certain pains and penalties. General Washburne has just informed the citizens of Memphis that, 'in the event of the re-election of the present Mayor, it is the intention of the military authorities to take charge of the municipal department of Memphis;' but the General hopes 'the citizens of Memphis will elect a ticket friendly to the Government, so that he may be relieved from the duty of interfering.'

ON June 25 the price of gold in New York was quoted at 220.

ENGLAND.

IN another part of our columns some account of the debate still pending in the House of Commons will be found. It may, however, be of interest to glance at the preparations made by the Conservative party for the attack. On Tuesday, June 28, a meeting was held at the residence of the Marquis of Salisbury in Arlington Street. Only one peer was present, namely, the Earl of Derby. The meeting was attended by 231 members of the House of Commons. The Earl of Derby presided, being supported by Mr. Disraeli, General Peel, Lord John Manners, Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Estcourt, Sir Stafford Northcote, and other prominent members of the party. Lord Derby, in addressing the meeting, reminded his friends that the attacks which for the last three years had been directed against the Established Church, had now been abandoned, owing to the firm front displayed by the Conservative party. As to the Danish question Her Majesty's Government had at one time stated that in certain contingencies Denmark would not be allowed to enter upon the contest with Germany alone; as matters progressed the ground was shifted, and the contingency on which action was to be taken against Germany was successively changed—Federal execution, the invasion of Slesvig, the seizure of Fredericia, and the occupation of Jutland, each in turn being the interdicted act. He did not mean to say that England ought now to interfere, but he complained that Denmark had been deceived by this reiteration of unfulfilled threats. This policy had lowered the country, sunk its renown, and lessened its influence in the eyes of Europe. In reference to the resolution prepared by Mr. Disraeli, a copy of which has already been published in our columns, and on which the debate in the Commons elsewhere noticed is based, the noble Lord said that he could not be certain that a majority would be obtained in the House, but he solemnly and sincerely believed that the resolution would carry with it the approving voice of the country. The terms of the resolution were then read and received with loud cheering. On Monday last, July 4, another meeting was held at Lord Salisbury's, at which very many members of the Conservative party were present.

JOHN SEYMOUR, of 32 Wellclose Square, Whitechapel, appeared on July 1 before Mr. Henry, the magistrate at the Bow Street Police Court, on a summons issued under the Foreign Enlistment Act. He was charged with having unlawfully attempted to hire one Robert Sadd and others to serve by sea in the employment of certain persons assuming to exercise the power of government in a foreign country. The defendant was described as a 'boarding-house keeper' and a native of Cephalonia, in Greece. Mr. Giffard, instructed by Mr. Pollard of the Treasury, appeared for the Crown, and Mr. G. Lewis, of Ely Place, Holborn, the well-known attorney, appeared for the defence. At the suggestion of Mr. Giffard, the depositions of the witnesses were read. That of Robert Sadd proved that on the 7th and 8th of April last he was engaged by the defendant as a fireman to join a ship at Calais, that his wages were to be 4*s.* a day and his victuals while the ship lay in dock, and 5*l.* 16*s.* a month, with 10*l.* bounty, on sailing. He was to meet the defendant on April 9, to go with him to Calais. However, from something told him by a friend, he eventually declined to go. He had seen the three men Connell, Smith, and Grace, at the defendant's house. Edward Smith proved that on April 7 he was engaged by the defendant to go to Calais to work on board the Rappahannock, for 4*s.* a day and his victuals and lodging. Connell, Grace, and many others were engaged at the same time. Some few days after six of them sailed from London Bridge in the Hanover steamer, after having signed an agreement. On arriving at Calais they went on board the Rappahannock, and told an officer of the ship who had sent them and what were the terms of their engagement. The first lieutenant, however, would only offer them the terms that they should sign on board the ship for three years, at 5*l.* 16*s.* a month and 10*l.* bounty. They refused to join and returned to London. The witness had received 15*s.* from the defendant for his lost time. Grace and Connell gave similar testimony. Mr. Lewis said that there was a perfect answer to the charge, but he would reserve it for another tribunal. Mr. Henry committed the defendant for trial, but accepted bail.

EDWARD CAMPBELL, 'seaman's boarding-house keeper,' appeared at the Liverpool Police Court on June 30 to a summons issued under the Foreign Enlistment Act. The charge was that he did in the month of December, and also in the month of May last, hire, engage, retain, or procure Patrick Shanley, John Fleming, and others, to be employed or engaged in the service of the Confederate States of America contrary to the statute of 59 George III. c. 69. The information was laid by Mr. W. G. Bateson, of the firm of Bateson and Robinson, on behalf of the solicitors to the Lords of the Treasury. It was proved on the evidence of Shanley, Fleming, and other witnesses, that the men named were hired as firemen by the defendant at 7*l.* per month to serve on board the Georgia, that defendant took them to Cherbourg and saw them on board, and that when the Georgia discharged her crew in the Mersey, the men were engaged to serve on board the Rappahannock. It was contended for the defendants that the statute only named officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines, and that a fireman would not be within the Act. The magistrate committed the defendant for trial.

LAST week died General Sir Robert Gardiner, K.C.B. He was born in 1781, and obtained his commission in the Royal Artillery in 1797. He first saw service under Sir Charles Stuart, and was present at the capture of Minorca. He returned to England at the peace of Amiens. He next went to Hanover, under Lieutenant-General Don, with the expedition which was destined to join the Russian army under Count Tolstoy, but returned home after Austerlitz, under the terms of the treaty of Presburg. He next proceeded to Sicily, and on his return home joined Sir Arthur Wellesley's force, and was present at the battles of Roleia and Vimiera, and the capture of Lisbon. He next served under Sir John Moore in the campaign which terminated with the battle of Corunna. Afterwards he served in the Walcheren expedition. Next he joined Sir Thomas Graham, and was present at the battle of Barossa. He distinguished himself at the siege of Badajoz, under Lord Wellington. He was subsequently present at Salamanca and the capture of Madrid. He served in the siege of Burgos, at Morales, in the battle of Vittoria, in the Pyrenees, at Orthes, Tarbes, and Toulouse. On the return of Napoleon he again joined the Duke of Wellington, and fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. After the establishment of peace he became principal equerry to Prince Leopold. Subsequently, he was military aide-de-camp to George IV., William IV., and to Her Majesty. He received at different times the order of the Guelph, the Russian order of St. Anne, the grand cross of Carlos III. He had the gold medal and clasps for Barossa, Salamanca, Vittoria, Orthes, and Toulouse, the silver war medals for Roleia, Vimiera, and Corunna, and the Waterloo medal and clasp.

THE REV. WILLIAM CURETON, D.D., Canon of Westminster and Rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, died on June 17, in the 56th year of his age, having achieved, by his laborious researches in oriental manuscripts, a reputation that will survive for centuries. He was appointed assistant-keeper of the manuscripts in the British Museum in 1837, and undertook the preparation of a classed catalogue of the Arabic portion of the collection. The first part of this work was published in 1846. In 1841 the trustees acquired the collection of Syriac MSS. obtained through Dr. Tattam from the Monastery of St. Mary Deipara, in the desert of Nitria, near Cairo, and on these Dr. Cureton expended immense labour, classifying and arranging the disordered fragments. About 1845 arose the famous controversy concerning the Epistles of St. Ignatius, in which Samuel Lee, Bunsen, Baur, Helgenfeld, Jacobson, and others took part, and in the course of which the 'Vindiciæ Ignatianæ' was published. About the same time Dr. Cureton edited the text of a portion of the Syriac version of the 'Festal Letters of St. Athanasius,' the palimpsest fragments of the 'Iliad of Homer' contained in the Nitrian MS., and the third part of the 'Ecclesiastical History of John, Bishop of Ephesus.' Subsequently he published his 'Spicilegium Syriacum,' containing remains ascribed to Bardessanes, Melito of Sardes, Ambrose, &c., with an English translation and notes. In 1858 he published the remains of an ancient recension of the Syriac Gospels, and in the preface worked out his celebrated argument in favour of the Hebrew original of St. Matthew's Gospel. Three years later Dr. Cureton brought out the 'History of the Martyrs in Palestine' by Eusebius of Cæsarea. At the time of his death he was employed on a work destined to contain a portion of the original Aramaic document cited by Eusebius as preserved in the archives of Edessa, and also to show that the famous epistles attributed to our Lord and to Abgarus, king of Edessa, had strong claims to genuineness. Dr. Cureton aided largely in the labours of the Society for the Publication of Oriental Texts. In 1859 he was appointed Crown trustee of the British Museum, an office in which he has now been succeeded by the Dean of Windsor. In 1855 he was elected, on the death of Dr. Gaisford, as corresponding member of the Institute of France, and in 1860 he succeeded Professor Wilson as Foreign Associate of the Institute.

THE new Act, 26 & 27 Victoriæ, cap. 78, came into operation last week, and London found relief from one of its many nuisances. By it eighty-one turnpike gates and side bars situated in the roads lying north of the Thames, and running immediately from the principal streets, were swept away. A great reduction was also effected in the tolls payable at gates in the surrounding rural districts. Exertions are now being made to obtain the same relief on the Surrey side of the river.

ON the last day of June Harrow School was honoured by the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. Viscount Palmerston, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Brougham also visited the school. The recitation of the speeches and the award of the prizes by the head master, the Rev. Montagu Butler, commenced at half-past one o'clock. Passages from Shakspeare, Molière, Schiller, Plautus, and Tacitus were given alternately with the prize poems and essays composed by the boys. The chief interest, however, was concentrated on an extract from a speech delivered many years ago by Lord Brougham against the Holy Alliance. The whole scope of the oration went to prove that, where the integrity of a small European State was menaced by the aggression of more powerful neighbours, it was the duty of England at all hazards to interpose by force of arms and to insure the salvation of the oppressed sovereignty. With a few corrections of names, the speech might have been delivered with effect during the past week in Parliament, and it may easily be imagined that no small impression on the audience was caused by it. The Princess of Wales appeared to be much moved, while the noble Premier seemed rather amused than otherwise by this unexpected condemnation of his policy.

THE annual cricket match between Eton and Winchester Schools was played last week at Winchester. The last-named school obtained 76 runs in the first and 210 runs in the second innings. Eton obtained 116 runs in the first innings, and scored the 171 runs necessary to secure the victory with the loss of only one wicket. In the second innings of Eton, the Hon. S. G. Lyttelton scored 96 runs, while Mr. Prideaux scored 54 runs. The play of these gentlemen excited great admiration.

A TROTTING match came off in the neighbourhood of Leeds last week between a noted horse called Jack Rossiter, now aged nineteen years, and a mare called Matchless, purchased for the sole purpose of defeating the invincible Jack. The match was for 50*l.* a side, and the distance to be run was 50 miles for the horse, and 49 miles and 1,260 yards for the mare. At the end of the 45th mile the mare fell down dead. Jack Rossiter did his 50 miles in three hours and thirty minutes, twenty-seven miles of the journey having been completed in one hour and forty minutes. The winner was in a most deplorable state at the finish. If this is to be taken as a specimen of the way in which trotting matches are conducted in England, it will be with much pleasure that we shall learn that 'the sport' has been abandoned.

LOVERS of horses have had a great opportunity during the last five days of indulging their powers of admiration for that noble animal. The Agricultural Hall at Islington has been converted into one vast stable, in which 310 horses and ponies have been exhibited. The arrangements for the comfort of the animals and the visitors were excellent, and the vast area in the centre of the building formed a magnificent promenade in which the capacities of the competitors could be displayed with advantage. There were thirteen classes, and for each class three prizes were given. The prizes consisted of pieces of plate varying in value from 5*l.* to 100*l.* The classes were:—First: Thoroughbred stallions best calculated to get horses for the turf, the chase, or the park. Second: Hacks, roadster stallions of any height or breed. Third: Hunters able to carry fourteen stone. Fourth: Hunters of five years and upwards, without restriction as to weight-carrying powers. Fifth, Hunters of any age. Sixth: Weight-carrying cobs under fifteen hands. Seventh: Heavy chargers. Eighth: Light chargers. Ninth: Carriage-horses in match pairs. Tenth: Arab barbs or other Oriental horses. The remaining classes were for ponies of various heights. Of the classes other than the first, we may observe that the Duchess of Beaufort showed a pair of black carriage-horses, both got by Jericho and bred in Cambridgeshire, which, for style and action, surpass any animals of the kind which it has been our fortune to see. Her Ladyship also won a prize with her barb Mazagan, a horse bred at Mazagan; the judges, however, deciding that a similar prize should be given to Opal, the property of Mrs. Turnbull, an Arab of the pure Nidjed breed, whose colour was a silver white. General Sir Henry Rawlinson exhibited an Arab, called the Caliph, bred by the Sheikh of the Wahabis, and boasting a registered pedigree of 400 years. In another class, a horse called the Cid was exhibited, who deserves remark as an excellent specimen of a cross between the English racehorse and the Arab. His sire was Claret, a high-caste Arab; his dam, Brenda, was by Speculator by Lottery, and the dam of Brenda was by Camel. As a rule, the Arab in England deserves to be considered a mere plaything, and though the theory of crossing is upheld by a section of grumblers at the English racehorse, yet the results cannot be considered as satisfactory. General Angerstein has given the theory every opportunity of proving its value, and the only rational conclusion is that, if action be obtained, a good park hack may be the result; while, on the other hand, an Arab with action is a rarity, and a produce of the cross capable of carrying eleven stone is seldom to be seen. In fact, such animals realise to the full the idea of splendid inutility. To the Cid, however, must be conceded an amount of praise which is seldom due. The hunters were most admirable as a class, and presented that marvellous combination of size, strength, and activity, which alone can carry the strong and heavy Englishman over the fences and broad fields of Leicestershire and Northamptonshire. The show of ponies was also highly attractive. Class 1, perhaps, however, excited the greatest interest. After all, no animal presents to the eye of an Englishman such charms as a thoroughbred stallion, and it is a real treat to him to see the horse, whom years before he has beheld on Epsom Downs in the activity of severe condition, now developed into that large and happy creature whom age and a luxurious existence so inevitably produce. Forty-two horses were shown in this class, and before saying a word on the English horses, it may be observed that America did not go unrepresented. A horse called Rubicon, by Lexington out of Bay Leaf by Yorkshire, displayed points which induce the thought that the American blood might in some cases be used with great advantage. He was a wiry and cleanly-built horse, with remarkable hips and great propelling power. There was also an appearance of hardy vigour about him, and a total absence of that soft look which often tells such tales in some of the English strains. Referring now to the racehorses, we are bound to say that in our opinion the judges have made a mistake almost ludicrous in awarding the first prize to Citadel, a horse by Stockwell out of Sortie by Melbourne, bred by the Earl of Derby, and purchased as a yearling by Lord Stamford. No one can deny that if weight was the criterion, then the judges were right. But the object was to select the horse most fit to beget sons for the turf, or the chase, or the park. Citadel could only beget a racehorse by accident; he is too lumbersome and too indifferent a galloper for the purpose. He might beget a hunter provided that the mare had the best of feet and transmitted them to her progeny, for the small feet of Citadel would absolutely preclude him from moving in a heavy ploughed field. The idea of his sons being park hacks is too ridiculous for consideration. Nutbourne, by the Nabob out of Princess by Merry Monarch, obtained the second prize. He is a beautiful horse, but he is too heavy in the carcase and too light in the leg. The third prize was given to Caractacus by Kingston out of Defenceless by Defence. This horse won the Epsom Derby in 1863, defeating the Marquis and Buckstone, and perhaps only missed the first prize on this occasion because judges always fear the accusation of being slaves to the prestige of turf victories. Caractacus has great power: his bone is good, and his head, neck, and shoulders recall his noble sire. If he had but a little more length and was not quite so coarse, he would indeed be a grand horse. Perhaps, however, of all those exhibited, Lord Stamford's Newcastle by Newminster by Touchstone out of Mary Aislabie by Malcolm, was the best. He is a little small in the bone, and was not as a racehorse quite so fast as his shape would indicate; but he is so truly made, has such good shoulders, back, and loin, and possesses such fine action, that a small fault may readily be forgiven. The Epsom and Doncaster Cup proved his stoutness, and verified his descent from the immortal Touchstone. Besides these we may mention the Great Eastern, an immense horse by Surplice out of Boarding-school Miss by Plenipotentiary; also the grand old steeple-chase horse, Sir Peter Laurie, now twenty years of age, and still fresh and sound, the son of the famous Saddler, and having Priam for his maternal grandsire. There was also Amsterdam, by the Flying Dutchman out of Urania by Idle Boy, an elegant son of an elegant sire—a horse, too, who, carrying the colours of Mr. Padwick, proved that, with the appearance, he inherited the speed of the Dutchman. The notorious Old Calabar; Lord Palmerston's Mainstone; the King of Diamonds; and Kentucky, by Mickey Free out of Indiana by Muley Moloch out of Pocahontas, were also shown. Good, however, as the class undoubtedly was, it was almost meagre compared with what an exhibition would be to which Stockwell, Rataplan, Newminster, Sweetmeat, and other great sires could be attracted. It must always, in fact, be remembered that no prize could well be offered sufficiently magnificent to entice owners to risk a journey and a show with horses that are nearly worth their weight in gold. The exhibition, however, was so excellent as to tempt the hope that it is but the first of a long series.

LORD HENRY BENTINCK'S magnificent stud has been sold by auction. Messrs. Tattersall put up to competition ninety-nine lots, comprising hunters, hacks, a few brood mares, and some young stock. Lord Henry reserved the right of bidding up to 350 guineas for twenty lots, the remainder being proposed for sale without reserve. The 75 hunters realised 12,461 guineas, being an average of something like 166 guineas each. One horse called Comet fetched 400 guineas, and another called Lightheart fetched 410 guineas. His Lordship's stables, erected at the cost of 5,000*l.*, were much admired by the visitors to the sale. His Lordship has hunted the Burton country (Lincolnshire) for twenty years, and has spent in horseflesh no less a sum than 139,000*l.*

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, as Master of the Trinity House, entertained His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, the Lord Chancellor, the Ministers of the Crown, and other persons of distinction, last week, in the Hall on Tower Hill. Two speeches were delivered by the Prince of Wales, in which His Royal Highness paid a high tribute of praise to the ancient corporation and to its noble Master. The Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Somerset, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer also spoke, the two noblemen responding to the toast of the army and navy, and Mr. Gladstone proposing 'the maritime and commercial interests of the country.' It will be remembered that Lord Palmerston succeeded the late Prince Consort as Master of the Trinity House.

A CORONER'S jury, convened at an inquest held on the body of a waterman killed by a shell fired in Plymouth Sound, has returned a verdict of manslaughter against Major-General William Nelson Hutchinson. The General has been arrested and committed for trial at the assizes.

LORD BROUGHAM, as President of the Law Amendment Society, has expressed himself somewhat freely, at the dinner of that Society, on the Danish question. He said that the people of the country have resolved that there shall be no war with the German Powers, and that the people were right in that conclusion. We had no right, certainly no duty, singly and unsupported to make war in favour of those who were ill-used, in order to obtain for them redress for the grievances to which they were subjected. He thought it a step in social progress that, instead of having recourse to the arbitrament of the sword, we should have recourse only to serious complaint and reasoning with the wrong-doer — that we should have made protestations, have given our advice, and, having done this, should stop short of actual force and refuse to throw away our forces in an impossible expedition for the sake of revenging the injury that had been done to others. He was far, however, from insinuating that any menace or any threat, either directly uttered or in any language which could be construed into a threat should ever be used. He hoped that nothing of the kind had been used. If such had been used, a very grave error had been committed. If we could not afford to be chivalrous, at any rate we were bound to be honest.

NEW ZEALAND.

Advices from New Zealand announce that the troops besieged Galepa on the 27th ult. An attempt was made to carry the position by storm, but was repulsed by the natives with severe loss to the British. Colonel Booth and five officers of the 43rd Regiment were killed. The Maori loss was 100. Their leader had since been defeated by friendly natives.

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

THE official statements of the respective losses in the capture of the Isle of Alsen are as follows:—The Danes lost 100 officers and 2,300 men captured, and 1,400 killed and wounded; they were further forced to blow up two ships, the crews of which, however, were fortunately saved; the Rolf Krake was hit in several places and set on fire. The Prussian loss consisted of 3 officers killed and 17 wounded, and 300 rank and file killed and wounded. The Prussian troops examined the battle-field attentively after the conflict, and found among the wounded a party of 400 Swedish volunteers; no quarter was given to them. Four hundred souls were sacrificed to that feeling of nationality which the Germans profess to look up to as the guide and object of their aspirations—unless, forsooth, nationality is a principle too sacred to be transplanted from German hearts into a Scandinavian bosom. The Danes retired southwards after the battle, and, on the 2nd inst., evacuated the whole island, leaving 11 spiked guns as trophies to the enemy. In the north of Jutland an attempt was made by a party of Danes to establish a footing on the south shore of the Limfjord, but they were driven back with the loss of 60 prisoners. The Danish ships Fordenskiold, 34, and Slesvig, 12, made a reconnaissance of the coast off Rugen, and were shelled by the Prussian batteries, but with what effect is not ascertained.

It is understood that the plan of operations for the ensuing campaign was definitely settled at the Royal meeting at Carlsbad. All the continent and as many as possible of the islands are to be occupied, and the sea forces of the Allies largely increased. We hear already of the arrival of an ironclad corvette sailing under Portuguese colours and answering to the name of Pedro, which has been recently purchased by the Prussian Government. To this may be added the Victoria and Augusta, two fine vessels, bought in the neutral territory of France for the service of the belligerent Prussians.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has issued an address to his army informing them of his accession to their command, and congratulating them on the fresh glories reaped by them in Alsen.

There is a rumour of peace flitting about Europe. They say that the King of Denmark is anxious to come to an arrangement with the Germans. Probably the tone of the Parliamentary debates in England has had a great effect upon him.

THE DUCHIES.

The Austro-Prussians are anxious to systematise the administration pro tempore of the United Duchies of Slesvig-Holstein, and for that purpose have applied to the Federal Diet for leave to regulate their affairs. The Duke of Augustenburg is asserting with all his might that possession which is nine points of the law. He continues to make addresses to the deputations which wait upon him from various parts of the Duchies. He lately, in answer to a delegation from the priests, said that his mere right was as good for the north of Slesvig as for Holstein, but that he could contemplate the possibility of an adverse vote in that quarter; in that case he begged that the inhabitants of the south of Slesvig would not sacrifice to their personal loyalty for himself the advantage of a complete separation from Denmark—meaning apparently that the South Slesvigers ought not, by an attempt to coerce their northern brethren into allegiance, to imperil their own existence as a separate State.

The official gazette of Altona, of the date of the 5th inst., publishes the following:—'The local committee assembled at Kiel to examine the line proposed 1848-9 from Kiel harbour to Buttel has received permission from the Holstein (i.e. Federal) Government to undertake the necessary surveys.' A cursory examination of the map will, we think, lead our readers to the conclusion that the object desired by the German Governments is to give England the entire command of the Baltic commerce. The British island of Heligoland, lying about twenty miles N.W. of the western extremity of the proposed canal, will form a most convenient station for a squadron of observation, should such be necessary.

GERMANY.

In our last week's number we gave an analysis of the summary of the London Conference drawn up by one of the Plenipotentiaries. To this summary the belligerent Powers reserved the right of adding any corrections or making any protests which they might think fit. In accordance with this reservation, Baron von Beust has addressed to Lord Russell a note, dwelling upon certain contested points. Several of these are of little consequence. That which is most deserving of attention is his protest against the assumption that Slesvig continued to belong to the crown of Denmark after the death of Frederick VII.; and, as a corollary to the former, his assertion of the idea that in the proposed division of Slesvig it was not Denmark who abandoned part of her territory to Germany, but Germany who was willing to make large concessions to Denmark for the sake of peace.

The Duke of Oldenburg has addressed a letter to the King of Prussia, requesting his support in favour of his claims to the sovereignty of the Duchies. This step has caused some excitement at Berlin; but it is not expected that the King of Prussia will give him more than the promise of an impartial examination into the claims of the respective candidates. We have already pointed out on several occasions the reasons which would induce Prussia to take a favourable view of the Duke of Oldenburg's claims. But it must not be forgotten that his success would put an end to the hopes of territorial aggrandisement which, whether rightly or wrongly, have been often of late attributed to Prussia. Moreover, the nominee of Russia to the Duchies, although not less of a vassal to the Czar than is, or was, the King of Prussia himself, might find opportunities to assert his privileges as last favourite of the Imperial throne in a manner inexpressibly galling to the pride of Prussia.

If the strange wild story of our contemporary the Morning Post is to be believed, and the documentary evidence of notes and despatches which it publishes to be received as trustworthy, the relations between Prussia, Austria, and Russia are of the closest description. Such is the length of the correspondence published that it would be impossible even to give a summary of it. Suffice it to say that it tells us that the conduct of Russia throughout the whole Dano-German quarrel has been a hollow mockery; that the Czar was quite willing to sacrifice the integrity of that kingdom to the necessities of his allies; and that the ultimate result of the present disturbances would be the re-establishment of the Holy Alliance. The Prussian Cabinet has, with the loudest voice, denied the authenticity of the correspondence published; and they have so far a presumption in their favour, that the mania for the forgery of diplomatic papers has spread into Europe from Yankeeland like an epidemic, and threatens to destroy all our confidence in printed despatches. But, apart from this presumption, there is nothing to lead us to suppose that the documents are not genuine representations of the feelings and wishes of the three Powers of the East.

The Allied Governments have sent a circular to their foreign agents, declaring that they considered themselves to be no longer bound by any concessions which they might have made at the Conference of London in the interests of peace.

The treaties for the reestablishment of the Zollverein were signed on June 28 by the Ministers of Prussia, Saxony, Baden, Electoral Hesse, Thuringia, Brunswick, and Frankfort; the signature of Oldenburg is shortly expected: Hanover and Wurtemburg have not yet signified their assent.

No one who has ever stirred from his native country has not been thankful for one form at least of piracy, which, instead of robbing the needy of his last necessary, places within easy reach of him one of the great luxuries of the age. We allude to the piracy of foreign works which goes on at Leipsic on so large a scale, and which has made the name of Tauchnitz famous throughout all the world. We defy any one not to modify very considerably the severe condemnation which he has probably pronounced on these highwaymen of literature while seated easily at home, when, after sulking moodily in Constantinople, Cairo, Kamschatka—anywhere, in short, in this hemisphere—he lights upon a shopful of those unlawful pleasures, and revels in the possession of the last new novel or history, bought for the same sum which he might in England have paid for a week's loan of it. But unauthorised editions have been published, not only of English works, but of those of every other nation, notably the French; though, in consequence of the cheapness of light literature in France, the effect has never been so striking as is the case with the English books. Now, however, Saxony has given in its adhesion to an international copyright treaty with France, and the French Tauchnitz is a thing of the past. Can it be a prelude to a like step for the protection of English literature?

DENMARK.

On the 25th ult., a member of the Danish Rigsraad asked the Government what instructions the Danish Plenipotentiaries had received with regard to the division of Slesvig by the Schlei-Dannewirke line, or on the proposed prolongation of the armistice. Bishop Monrad replied that Lord Russell had promised neither to propose nor to support any scheme less favourable to Denmark than the division above mentioned. Lord Russell, however, had not been stopped by this circumstance from proposing a reference to arbitration in the meeting of the Conference on the 18th ult. Bishop Monrad was at a loss to explain how Lord Russell had been able to reconcile this course of action with his former promise.

In the sitting of the Landsthing of the 29th ult., the Minister of Finance brought forward a scheme for a loan of 800,000*l.* to meet the expenses of the war.

The conquered province of Jutland is to pay dearly for its patriotism and devotedness. The Allied Powers propose to establish a very strict administration on its territory, for the purpose of imposing taxes and contributions. Care will be taken that the rich revenues and resources of that country shall indemnify the Allies as far as possible for the continual sacrifices imposed upon them by the war. The fact is, that the Prussian Government have already carried out this scheme to the utmost, and are now very willing to shift on to other shoulders the burden of the responsibility. An impersonality like the Federal Diet can do and say much from which an individual government would shrink, as that august body has already sufficiently proved to us.

FRANCE.

The Emperor of the French is entertaining a select circle of guests at Fontainebleau, according to his annual custom. The first series of them took their departure on Saturday last, and were replaced by the second, among whom figure conspicuously the names of the Austrian and Prussian ambassadors. Among other visitors who have lately had the honour of Imperial hospitality, is Baron von Beust, the ubiquitous. Among the more distinguished but perhaps less important guests are the Prince of Orange, heir-apparent to the throne of Holland, and the Comte de Flandres, second son of the King of the Belgians.

The news from the wine districts is most welcome to all thirsty souls. From the Beaujolais district we hear that the partial disasters under which the hopes of the vineyards have lately sunk are rapidly being effaced, and every prospect of a magnificent vintage is visible. Not less favourable are the reports from the southern districts. The oïdium, that fatal disease which has made Madeira little more than a painful recollection to us, and which has so often dashed the hopes of Bordeaux and Burgundy to the ground, has been signally checked by the continued prevalence of the sirocco. It is certainly an ill wind that blows nobody good; but up to this time ramblers in the South of Europe had considered the sirocco as the very type and incarnation (so to speak) of an ill wind par excellence.

The free trade in theatres which has lately been inaugurated in Paris is likely to have some portentous results. First, in the number of theatres; it is expected that eighty at least will shortly be open to amuse the pleasure-seekers of Paris, of which some will accommodate 10,000 persons. The population of Paris at the present time may be roughly stated at 2,500,000; how that number will support an array of theatres large enough for a first-rate kingdom is a problem which awaits solution. A humorous contemporary reminds us that a similar liberty was given to the theatres in the time of the Directory, when the population was about 800,000. The number of theatres then rose to forty, of which about thirty-nine and a half were shortly ruined. In consequence of this rather staggering result, the number of theatres was restricted by Napoleon I. to eight. We wish the new experiment a better success. Then as to the nature of the performances in the various theatres. Up to this time each has had its peculiar line fixed for it; the Français supplied the classical pieces both in tragedy and comedy, the Opéra Comique supplied light music, the Odéon, Palais Royal, &c., had each its own spécialité. Now, however, all restrictions are removed: we may hear 'Norma' at the Ambigu-Comique, or 'Le Cid' at the Bouffes, if it so pleases the omnipotent lessees. As a sort of make-weight to the general removal of protections and restrictions, the police have devised an elaborate code of regulations to be enforced at all theatres, embracing nearly all the details of theatrical management and domestic arrangement.

Time was when it was a somewhat important event in a man's life to break his neck, both with regard to the violence required to perform that feat, and the consequences of its performance. The following story will show how rapidly we are advancing out of the mists of prejudice in both respects. A girl in Paris happened to have her attention called to some object behind her back, and naturally turned her head round to observe it. The vivacity of the action was so great that she dislocated the two first vertebræ of her spine; in plain English, she broke her neck by looking round too hard. A doctor was instantly summoned: he examined the body, and, struck with a sudden inspiration, determined to experiment on it. With the aid of an assistant, he gently twisted back the head to its original position; the vertebræ returned to their place; the girl was alive again. Eight days afterwards she was able to resume her occupations. The name of the surgeon who performed this wonderful operation was M. Maisonneuve, of the Hôtel Dieu. A few more of such experiences will oblige us to look out for a new system of capital punishment in England.

A decisive operation was performed by General de Martimprey, the temporary Governor-General of Algiers, against the revolted Arab tribes, on the 26th and 27th ult. The insurgent Flittas were driven by a well-devised combination to their last refuges, and forced to surrender at discretion. Four thousand prisoners were taken as hostages and pledges of submission. It is expected that this success will close the insurrection.

On April 15 last, the autograph letters of the Emperor of the French were presented to the two Kings of Siam, by the French Consul, with great solemnity. The constitution of Siam gives an independent and equal power to each sovereign, so that any compliment paid to the one must of necessity be repeated to the other. The reception given to the Consul by the first King was carried out according to the ancient etiquette of Siam; the Consul was accompanied by thirty-nine magnificent gondolas, by banners and palanquins, by Mandarins in the richest costumes, and a body of troops about 1,500 in number. The King received him seated on his throne of state, with his most splendid crown on his head, and decorated with the insignia of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. He stepped from his throne to take from the hands of the Consul the golden vase containing the Emperor's letter, which was, of course, in the French language, but accompanied by an English translation. The King said that the receipt of this letter reminded him of that addressed by Louis XIV. to his predecessor, Phra-Nazai, and proceeded to translate it into Siamese for the benefit of his Court. In the evening the Consul was invited to a private entertainment, at which he met the King surrounded by his young family, and conversed with him for a long time in the English language. The interview with the second King was equally brilliant, and had this peculiarity, that this sovereign, while remaining faithful to the traditions of Siam, has adopted customs and even Court ceremonies of an entirely European character.

ITALY.

Letters from Naples, dated June 20, inform us that the Garibaldi fever has to some extent abated. The General has been unable to receive any public hospitality on account of his delicate health, but it was proposed to give a dinner to his two sons. He is for the present occupied in a scheme for uniting the various rites of Freemasonry into one. In connection with this subject it will be remembered that the political organisation of the Carbonari has been supposed to be a bastard form of the old craft. General Lamarmora has not yet considered himself justified in leaving Naples, and asserts that the manifestations in which the 'party of action' in Naples have lately been indulging are anything but reassuring for the public peace. Garibaldi proposes to move soon from the baths of Ischia to those of Torre Annunziata close to Naples.

The debate in the Italian Parliament on the financial policy of the Government has ended in the triumph of the Ministry. A vote of confidence in them was passed by a majority of 182 to 126.

On the Feast of St. Peter, June 29, the Pope went through the annual solemnity of receiving the oath of fidelity from the municipality of Rome. His Holiness expressed a hope that that body would remain faithful to its promise. He also expressed his intention of occupying himself more especially with the adornment of his capital.

RUSSIA.

The accounts from Trebizonde of the misery of the Circassian exiles in that city are of the most heart-rending description. Fancy a filthy Turkish town, without drainage for even ordinary purposes, with a population utterly careless of the mass of pestilent horrors commonly lying in every street; and into the midst of this cram a mass of half-naked refugees, without food or shelter, ravaged by typhus fever, dysentery, and even worse, dying at the rate of 300 daily, and leaving the unburied carcases further to pollute the already deadly air, and you will have some conception of the present state of Trebizonde. No less than 130,000 of these poor wretches were in the town on June 15. The mortality among them was frightful; the Turkish Government has done much to remedy it, by sending to their aid Dr. Barozzi, whose devotion and skill are worthy of the noblest recompense, and have been rewarded by the Emperor of the French with the Legion of Honour.

The ancient city of Nijni-Novgorod has been partially destroyed by an awful fire, which broke out just before the meeting of the world-famous fair. 437 private houses, 12 government buildings, 40 warehouses, 1,514 shops, and 148 miscellaneous buildings have been utterly destroyed, besides several large timber yards. Had the fair begun, the loss would have been simply incalculable; even as it is, it will amount to several millions of francs, of which only 800,000 were insured. The conflagration which effected this continued for ten hours only, whence we may gather the inflammable nature of those ancient cities.

There is a story circulated in Germany and some circles in Paris that, the match between the heir-apparent of the Imperial throne of Russia and the Princess Dagmar of Denmark having been definitively broken off, another is in the course of negotiation between His Imperial Highness and the Princess Helena of England.

PERU.

The Spanish Government has published a circular repeating the sentiments of Señor Pacheco, which we published last week. It is said that Señor Salazar y Mazarredo, the commissioner who gave rise to the main difficulties, has sent in his resignation, which has been accepted. The Peruvian people are by no means inclined to be browbeaten into silence, and are buying ships and artillery. It is not generally understood that the title borne by Señor Salazar was singularly insulting to the Peruvians, inasmuch as the delegate of the Spanish Government to the Viceroy of Peru, before the war of independence, was also called 'Commissioner Extraordinary.' This fact, coupled with the seizure of the Chincha Islands on the pretence that they were Spanish possessions, has led the Peruvians to believe that the Spaniards wish to reassert their dominion over their ancient colony.

MEXICO.

On the day after the arrival of the Emperor of Mexico at Vera Cruz, he was informed by the English commodore stationed there that he was ordered by the British Government to put at the disposition of his Imperial Majesty two steamers, either for the purpose of making an excursion should his Majesty so please, or of carrying despatches. The Emperor received the commodore with great cordiality, and begged him to express his thanks to his Government for their courteous offer.

GENERAL BANKS AND HIS SOLDIERS.—We quote the following from the Courrier des États Unis, which borrows it from the Lincolnite organ the Republican of St. Louis. On leaving Alexandria in his retreat from the Red River expedition, General Banks ordered the town to be fired. This was done, and an enormous mass of property, chiefly belonging to Unionist owners, was destroyed. The wives and children of these Unionists, most of whom were absent in the ranks of the Federal army, fled to Banks, to expostulate and demand assistance and means of transport. They were received literally with the point of the bayonet, and their entreaties flatly refused. 5,000 or 6,000 negroes had been taken from the neighbouring plantations; room was made for them on board the transports by throwing overboard some of their cargo of captured cotton, but for the wretched women and children no such sacrifice could be made. These occurrences created a profound impression in the Federal army. On its arrival at Semmesport the feelings of indignation against General Banks broke out with violence. He took refuge on board an ironclad gunboat, but the soldiery flocked to the shore of the stream, and called upon him with yells to come out and be shot. General Canby arrived, and implored them to be quiet, assuring them that no such expedition as the last should ever again be undertaken. They then demanded that General Banks should be subjected to trial for murder and hanged, and many of them declared their intention of quitting the service, if he was not tried by court-martial for his conduct. With the greatest difficulty Canby succeeded in restoring them to order and discipline. Such was the end of the Red River expedition, a worthy continuation of a plane nceived for a political object, and executed with iniquity.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE VOTE OF CENSURE.

The party battle commenced on Monday. The House of Commons presented an unusual spectacle. Every senatorial seat was engaged, and nearly 100 members had to content themselves with places in the gallery. From an early hour in the morning a number of persons were waiting for admission into the Strangers' and Speaker's Galleries. In the clock gallery, and in other parts of the House appropriated to them, were foreign Ministers, peers, and other distinguished persons. The gallery appropriated to ladies was of course full. Altogether the scene was unusually exciting. Lord Palmerston and Mr. Disraeli were cheered by the crowd collected in Palace Yard, and by their respective parties when they entered the House. Mr. Tennyson, the poet, was there, and it was a scene to inspire his muse. Sitting where he could see as well as hear the leader of the Opposition, was Earl Russell; and it was clear he required all the self-restraint he was master of to preserve the silence of a mere spectator. Often, it may be supposed, whilst Mr. Disraeli was speaking, the noble Earl must have regretted that he was entitled to sit in the painted chamber, and that he was not still a member of the Lower House. But though his Lordship did not speak, he did not in any way restrain the working of his countenance.

Mr. Disraeli spoke for upwards of three hours; and so far from attempting to give a summary of his oration, we must content ourselves with a bare outline of his principal arguments. He commenced by an exposition of the Danish question prior to the events which are now the subject of debate. The Powers of Europe, well knowing what long and disastrous wars had resulted from disputes as to succession, and being aware that the royal line of Denmark was likely to become extinct, framed the Treaty of 1852 for the purpose of averting any catastrophe on the death of the then King. Now that treaty was not binding on one Power more than upon another of those who signed it, and it was not a treaty of guarantee. The King of Denmark made such arrangements as he thought best in reference to the succession to his throne, and the Powers who signed the treaty merely pledged themselves to recognise the successor named in that instrument. There was, therefore, no legal obligation on England to go to war to defend or to maintain the title of King Christian to the Duchies of Slesvig and Holstein. Nor was the moral obligation, if there was any, so great as that which bound France to aid Denmark. In times past Denmark had been the tried and faithful ally of France and the brave and determined foe of England. But what has been the conduct of the Government? At first hopes had been held out to Denmark, and no doubt the promises made were sincere, for then the cooperation of France could be counted on. But the Polish insurrection completely altered the aspect of affairs. Earl Russell encouraged the Poles and then deserted them, and placed our ally, as well as this country, in a false position. Next came the proposition made by the Emperor of the French for a European Congress, and the refusal of the British Government to accede to this was curt and offensive. Now the proposal for the Congress was made on November 6, on the 16th the King of Denmark died, and on the 27th the British Government sent in their refusal to accept the Congress. Under such grave circumstances, the Government ought to have carefully considered their position; and, if they felt themselves compelled not to accede to the proposition made by the Emperor of the French, their refusal ought to have been couched in the most courteous and inoffensive terms. Her Majesty's Government continued to advise Denmark and to threaten Germany, by which Denmark was misled and Germany incensed. He did not mean that we ought to have gone to war for Denmark. Mr. Disraeli said: 'We were not bound by the Treaty of 1852 to go to the assistance of Denmark if she became involved in a war with Germany. No one pretends that we were. As a matter of high policy, much as we may regret any disturbance in the territorial limits of Europe—being a country the policy of which is a policy of tranquillity and peace—still there were no considerations which could have justified England in going to war, in entering into an expensive European war without the allies on whom we ought to have counted to prevent the consequence of a war between Denmark and Germany. There is another course equally intelligible and equally honourable, though I am bound to say that the course which I should have recommended the country to take would have been to occupy the same position as that of France.' The Conference had proved a failure, and altogether the policy of Her Majesty's Government had lowered the just influence of England and diminished the securities for peace. The Opposition had been taunted with not declaring a policy; but it was the duty of the responsible advisers of the Crown and not of Parliament to do that. How could the Opposition, not knowing what negotiations were being carried on, propose a policy? Mr. Disraeli concluded as follows:—

'The most we can do is to tell the noble Lord what is not our policy. We will not threaten and then refuse to act; we will not lure on our allies with expectations we do not fulfil; and, sir, if it ever be the lot of myself or any other public men with whom I act to carry on important negotiations in this country, as the noble Lord and his colleagues have done, I trust that we at least shall not carry them on in such a manner that it will be our duty to come to Parliament to announce to the country that we have no allies, and then declare that England can never act alone. Sir, those are words which ought never to have escaped the lips of a British Minister. They are sentiments which ought never to have occurred even to his heart. I repudiate—I reject them. I remember there was a time when England had not a tithe of her present resources, when, inspired by a patriotic cause, she triumphantly encountered a world in arms. And, sir, I believe now, if the occasion were fitting, if her independence or her honour were attacked and assailed, or her empire were endangered, I believe that England would arise in the magnificence of her might and struggle triumphantly for those objects for which men live and nations flourish. But I, for one, will never consent to go to war to extricate Ministers from the consequences of their own indiscretion. It is in this spirit that I have drawn up this Address to the Crown. I have drawn it up in the spirit in which the Royal Speech was delivered at the commencement of the Session. I am ready to vindicate the honour of the country whenever it is necessary, but I have drawn these resolutions up in the interests of peace. Sir, I beg leave to move—

'That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to thank Her Majesty for directing the correspondence on Denmark and Germany, and the protocols of the Conference recently held in London, to be laid before Parliament. To assure Her Majesty that we have heard with deep concern that the sittings of that Conference have been brought to a close without accomplishing the important purposes for which it was convened. To express to Her Majesty our great regret that, while the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government has failed to maintain their avowed policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, it has lowered the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace.'

Mr. Disraeli resumed his seat amidst loud and long-continued cheering.

Mr. Gladstone replied to Mr. Disraeli on behalf of the Government. He said that, although two amendments were to be submitted to the House, he deemed it right to answer Mr. Disraeli before those amendments were submitted, because the Government did not shirk responsibility, but were prepared to meet fully the charge brought against them. Mr. Gladstone then at some length contended that Mr. Disraeli had not fairly quoted from the Blue Book, that he had given garbled extracts, and that he had misrepresented the attitude of France on the Danish question. It had been said that the Danes had done all the British Government had wished them to do, and that, after so much compliance, they were deserted. That statement was not accurate. The Danes withdrew the patent and revoked the new Constitution at the joint request of friendly Powers; and, moreover, these concessions were made too late. It was on October 8 that England advised the withdrawal of the patent, but it was not until December 7 that it was withdrawn. So with regard to the new Constitution. The present King was unfortunately persuaded by his then Minister to dissolve his Parliament before revoking that Constitution, and consequently when the concession was made it was made too late. The advice tendered to Denmark by England was common advice assented to by other Powers. Her Majesty's Government had endeavoured in the interests of peace to bind together the Powers of Europe on this question. It was not for Her Majesty's Government to find fault with the course pursued by France or by Russia, but when it was found that these Powers would not unite with us, we were justified in proposing a compromise as we did in the Conference; for, except on rare occasions, England is not called upon to intervene single-handed in European questions. And supposing England had gone alone to the aid of Denmark, her energies would have been heavily taxed for an inadequate object, and she might have found that her judgment of the justice of the cause was not assented to by the people of the Duchies. After contending that the object of the vote of censure was a purely personal one, Mr. Gladstone declared Mr. Disraeli was afraid to announce a policy, or to propose a direct vote of censure, and said in conclusion: 'In vain is it for the right hon. gentleman to say, "Wait! Place me upon those benches, and then let me tell you what I mean to do." I do not think the country will consent to proposals based upon such conditions. Nay, more, I feel a most confident conviction that this House and the country will approve the course taken in these most difficult negotiations by the Government, and that they will reject a motion which both prudence and patriotism must alike emphatically condemn.'

Mr. Newdegate agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the resolutions submitted by Mr. Disraeli represented England as degraded before the nations of the world, and that was a proposition he (Mr. Newdegate) could not assent to. On the other hand, he could not deny that the influence of England had been lowered; and the only way to restore that influence was to take up a fixed position, and to show that we did not spend 30,000,000*l.* per annum over our armaments in vain, but that we were ready to uphold what we thought right by the sword. The proposition made by the neutral Powers in the Conference ought not to be departed from, and he therefore moved the substitution of the following words for the second paragraph of Mr. Disraeli's motion:—'To submit to Her Majesty the opinion of this House that the independence of Denmark and the possessions of that kingdom, on the terms proposed by the representatives of the neutral Powers in the recent Conference, ought to be guaranteed.'

Mr. Kinglake, who had an amendment on the paper, spoke in favour of the Government, and against Mr. Newdegate's amendment and the original resolution. General Peel supported the resolution, and the Lord Advocate defended the Government.

Lord Stanley said that the only real defence of the Ministerial policy was the speech that had been delivered by Mr. Gladstone; but it was always easy to criticise the terms of a vote of censure. No doubt the Government would have preferred a direct vote of want of confidence; for then, assailed on their foreign policy, they might have taken refuge in the success of the other departments of their administration; but if the Opposition had to find fault with the foreign policy of the Government, they had a right to do so in plain words. The resolution was not a war resolution, but it simply condemned that policy of threatening that had lowered the just influence of England. All the newspapers of the Continent were attacking England, and there never was a period when England was disliked as she is now. If Denmark had not been encouraged, she would not have manifested a spirit which is as impolitic as it is heroic; and Germany would have been less bitter. Without wishing to do so, the Government had misled the Danes; and, whilst desiring to preserve peace, they have brought the country to the verge of war.

The debate on Tuesday was resumed by Mr. Cobden. He said he did not think our position satisfactory, but he did not believe that it endangered peace, for in his experience a breakdown in our diplomacy was the best guarantee of peace. What was this Treaty of 1852, of which so much was heard? A few gentlemen sat around a table and decreed the destinies of nations which were not consulted in the matter. After a short notice of the causes of the present war in Denmark, which he traced to the pressure put upon the Sovereigns of Austria and Prussia by the German population, he asked what we should have done when the two Powers invaded Slesvig-Holstein. We ought, he said, to have mediated. But what had we done? When we set up for the office of mediator, we could not draw the line between mediator and partisan. There was, he observed, a party of menace in this country. Our power, it was true, was almost omnipotent at home; but, great as it was, we had no means of bringing it effectually to bear upon Germany. It would be childish to conceal from ourselves this fact; yet our Government, within the last six months, had proposed to other Powers to go to war with Germany, and we were saved from war, not by the discretion of our own Government, but by the wisdom of the Emperor of the French. Could this be termed policy? He put it to both sides of the House whether it was not high time that the Government should know its wishes on these ambiguous questions.

Lord Robert Cecil addressed the House at considerable length. He condemned the policy pursued by Earl Russell, who, he insisted, had neglected means of healing the quarrel by arbitration or mediation before the death of the late King of Denmark, which took place before the Earl could make up his dilatory mind. He dwelt upon his menacing language, amounting in more than one instance, he said, to a distinct threat in the subsequent correspondence, and on the evidence it afforded that the Government meditated resisting the Germans by England alone. The language of Lord Palmerston in July last, he contended, must be understood as a threat. If the considerations were sufficient to prevent England from engaging in war, they should have prevented threats, the non-fulfilment of which produced a loss of actual power that could be recovered only by future bloodshed. As to the future, if they could not save Denmark, they could rescue England from the risk of suffering similar dishonour.

Mr. Forster, Lord H. Vane, and Mr. Whalley supported the Government; and Mr. B. Johnston, Mr. Liddell, and Lord R. Montagu spoke in favour of the motion.

Mr. Roebuck made a powerful and humorous speech. He found fault with the policy of the Government, and he denounced the Opposition for having no policy. With all their faults, however, he preferred the Government to the Opposition.

Mr. Horsman declared that the Opposition had, by their silence, acquiesced in the policy they now condemned. The Opposition knew that the Conference would be a failure, yet they would not condemn it until it was over. The vote of censure affirmed no principle and enunciated no policy. The Opposition, so far from doing anything to prevent the mistakes of the Government, endeavoured to use them as stepping-stones to power. He, therefore, did not think that public policy required that the present Ministers should give place to men who had shown more weakness and less courage.

Mr. S. Fitzgerald observed that this was a question of confidence in the foreign policy of the Government, and the independent members who had spoken had avowed a want of such confidence, and yet were going to give a vote against the motion and expressive of confidence. He defended the resolution against the charge of its being unpatriotic; those who opposed the resolution, he said, were more open to that charge. The motion separated the Parliament from the conduct of the Government. The objection that it did not point out a policy had been sufficiently answered. It was impossible for an Opposition to indicate a policy. He contended that they were justified in challenging the opinion of the House on the conduct of the Government.

The debate was then adjourned till to-day.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Malmesbury gave notice that to-morrow he would move the following resolution: 'That this House has heard with deep concern that the sittings of the Conference recently held in London have been brought to a close without accomplishing the important objects for which it was convened; and that it is the opinion of this House that, while the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government has failed to maintain their avowed policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, it has lowered the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace.'

THE NEW HOLY ALLIANCE.

The diplomatic correspondence published by the Morning Post has given rise to several questions in both Houses, but neither Earl Russell nor Lord Palmerston has given explicit answers. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe has given notice of a motion on the subject in the Lords for to-morrow week.

CHAIN-PLATING FOR SHIPS.

The Earl of Hardwicke, adverting to the details of the recent conflict between the Alabama and the Kearsage, asked the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty whether his attention had been directed to the question of protecting ships of war by chain armour. The subject was not a new one, for it had been discussed in a letter written in 1862 to the noble Lord at the head of the Government by an iron-master resident at Belfast, in which he drew attention to the important results which might be gained by suspending chains over a ship's side to act as a foil against shot.

The Duke of Somerset said the defence afforded by the chain plating to the Kearsage must have been very small, for it only extended over a space about 36ft. in length, and the chain was of the kind known as 1¾-inch. The firing from the Alabama could not have been good, for this strip of plating was only struck twice during the engagement; one of the shots glanced off, and the other, which was the only one that hit the armour fairly, pierced it and lodged in the side of the vessel. At the same time, it was known that the Alabama entered upon the contest under great disadvantages, her powder being either damp or very bad, and the vessel herself in a very unfit state. Two or three years ago the Admiralty made some experiments with chain armour, and the result was that with a common 68-pounder and cast-iron shot it was knocked all to pieces, so that against steel projectiles it would afford no defence whatever. It did not at all follow that, as a makeshift, it would not be better than nothing, and at long distances, as in this case, it had some advantages. But what the Admiralty had to decide was—given a certain weight, how to apply it most effectively for the defence of a ship. Some time ago the noble Earl opposite expressed a doubt whether guns weighing 6½ tons each would not be found too heavy for broadside purposes. He had since ascertained that the two 11-inch guns on board the Kearsage, one before and the other abaft the mainmast, weighed each 7¾ tons. The real conclusions to be drawn from the conflict between the Kearsage and Alabama were, that very powerful guns and very speedy vessels were required. The speed of the Kearsage gave her great superiority over the Alabama, which, moreover, was not built for fighting purposes, but mainly with a view to cruising. Experiments had shown conclusively that the continuous surface of armour plate yielded great advantages over interrupted surfaces like bar-iron or chain covering.

FEDERAL ENLISTMENTS IN IRELAND.

(From the Dublin Gazette.)

BY THE LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.

CARLISLE.—Whereas in and by her Majesty's Royal Proclamation, published in the London Gazette on the 14th day of May, 1861, her Majesty declared her Royal determination to maintain a strict and impartial neutrality in the contest between the Government of the United States of America and the States styling themselves the Confederate States of America, and her Majesty did thereby charge and command all her loving subjects to observe a strict neutrality in and during the hostilities between the said States, and to abstain from violating or contravening either the laws or statutes of the realm in that behalf, or the law of nations in relation thereto, as they would answer to the contrary at their peril: And her Majesty did also thereby warn all her loving subjects, and all persons whatever entitled to her protection, that if any of them should presume, in contempt of that her Royal proclamation, and of her high displeasure, to do any acts in derogation of their duty as subjects of a neutral sovereign in the said contest, or in violation or contravention of the law of nations in that behalf—as, for example, and more especially (amongst other things), by entering into the military service of either of the said contending parties as commissioned or non-commissioned officers or soldiers—all persons so offending would incur and be liable to the penalties and penal consequences by the statute of the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., intituled 'An Act to prevent the enlisting or engagement of his Majesty's subjects to serve in foreign service, and the fitting out or equipping in his Majesty's dominions vessels for warlike purposes, without his Majesty's licence,' or by the law of nations on that behalf imposed or denounced: And whereas there is reason to believe that many of her Majesty's subjects have been induced to go and embark from various parts of the United Kingdom to the United States of America by false and delusive promises of employment upon railway and other public works in the said United States, and of high and greatly remunerative wages for their labour in such employment; and have, after their arrival in the said United States, been further induced to enter into the military service of the said States, and to serve therein as soldiers against the said Confederate States of America, contrary to their own original intention, and in contempt of her Majesty's said Royal proclamation: These are, therefore, to warn all such persons against the risk and danger which they may incur by accepting offers of employment as labourers in the said United States of America, whereby they may be entangled in military service in the said contest between the said United States and the said Confederate States of America, contrary to their own original intention, and in contempt of her Majesty's said Royal proclamation: And that all persons who may be entering, under the circumstances aforesaid, into the said military service, act in violation and contravention of their duty as subjects of her Majesty, and of the law of nations in relation thereto, and will incur and be liable to the several penalties and penal consequences by the said statute or by the law of nations in that behalf imposed or denounced, and will also, by such misconduct, incur her Majesty's high displeasure.

Dated at Dublin Castle, the 25th day of June, 1864.

By his Excellency's command,

THOMAS A. LARCOM.

TORPEDOES AS A LAND DEFENCE.—The Richmond Sentinel lately published a leader on the atrocities committed by the Federals. After contending that all remedies are lawful against robbers who come to steal property and destroy life, the article concludes by suggesting the use of torpedoes on land:—'We do not think we have made all the use we might of torpedoes as a defence against invasions and raids. Why confine their use to the water? Why not plant some of these in the highways by which Yankee cavalry approach our railroads, as well as in the channels by which their steamers ascend our rivers? It would be easy to set them so as to be exploded by the feet of the horses. A few of these properly planted around our bridges would greatly assist the guards, and would be as terrible as masked batteries once were. They might be planted in front of our lines wherever an attack is apprehended. In short, there is a wide field yet unexplored for their useful application, including the security against aggression which in many cases it might afford to private premises.'

'SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE' IN THE OLDHAM DISTRICT.

MEETING OF WORKING MEN.

A LARGE public meeting of the operatives and artisans of the manufacturing town of Lees (Oldham) was held on Thursday evening in the People's Hall of that town, for the purpose of adopting a memorial to Her Majesty's Government, praying that Her Majesty might be advised to take counsel with other European Powers, with a view to mediating between the combatants in the American war.

When it is mentioned that Lees is situate within a mile or two of so intensely Southern a centre as Oldham—and that in no other borough in Lancashire have the friends of the Confederacy shown more zeal in giving their neighbours frequent opportunities of comparing notes upon American affairs—there is no room for wonder that the inhabitants of the outlying and densely populated villages in that locality should be as well informed, and consequently as decidedly 'Southern,' as the well-nigh unanimous population of Oldham itself. About 1,000 people, chiefly mill-hands and skilled labourers, were present, and the conduct of the whole proceedings appeared to be left with advantage very much in the hands of the working men themselves.

A working man named John Wardle, upon being voted to the chair, proceeded to inform the meeting that he, in common with other working men whom he knew, was of opinion that it was right that the people of Lancashire, considering that they had so long borne the brunt of the battle, should have a word to say as to the time when they thought their hardships might properly be brought to an end. No doubt those whom he was addressing had been watching the run of things in America; and it was their duty to form their own opinions upon that matter, and to decide as to what they ought to do to let the Government know what those opinions were. He was glad to say that the committee had been successful in securing the attendance of the Secretary of the Southern Independence Association, Mr. T. B. Kershaw, in whom they would no doubt recognise an old friend who had fought the battle of South versus North in Lees many a time before.

Mr. Kershaw, who, on presenting himself to the crowd of working men, was very warmly welcomed, then addressed the meeting. He commenced by giving a brief outline of some of the conditions of the American war, dwelling chiefly upon the enormous area it covers, and pointing out many instances of Federal failure directly attributable to that condition alone. From this he proceeded to refer to the indomitable spirit of the Southern people, which he contended would be a full guarantee of ultimate success, even though some of the most favourable conditions were withdrawn. The logic of facts had incontestably proved that the North was unable to subjugate the South. The North had yet to take Richmond; and before Richmond was even assaulted, or Petersburg occupied, events might occur that would startle Washington itself. It was true that Grant had now nearly completed a circle round the Confederate capital, but it was also true that the more he looked for a weak place, the stronger every place seemed to get. Supposing, however, that Northern generalship (which had yet to be shown) and Northern resources in men (who had been killed off at the rate of nearly 5 to 1) should have the empty good-luck of taking Richmond, did anybody in his senses believe that the fall of a city would induce the Southerners to lay down their arms? Their capital was not this town or that, but every spot in the Confederacy where a Southern army kept back the invader. The experience of the last three or four years had gone far to verify President Davis's prophecy at the beginning of the war, that, in Virginia alone, the South could maintain with advantage its battles with the North for twenty years to come. From this point the lecturer passed on to contemplate the horrors of the American strife, and contrasted the single-minded patriotism of the Southerners in taking the field with the flower of their youth, with the sordid smartness of the Yankees in making money out of their own Government, by supplying the armies with hocussed recruits, made up of needy Irishmen and mercenary Germans. And yet, such being the odds in their favour, so far as brute resources went, the North could gain nothing but defeats. Grant had hurled his tens of thousands against Beauregard's fortifications, but it had been all in vain. Richmond had cost a sea of blood, but it was as far from being taken as ever; and, though it fell to-morrow, its fall would not in the slightest degree affect the Southern people and Government in maintaining their independence. But, reviewing the course of events, and realising, if possible, the frightful slaughter and inconceivable desolation that would attend the continuance of this wicked and fruitless war, it became the people of the cotton districts, whose voice would be listened to in this matter, to ask the Government how long this horrible state of things was to continue, without a single effort being made to bring the combatants to entertain terms of peace. No one would think of asking the Government to take any step that would involve England in a war with the United States. On the contrary, a joint and well-intentioned intervention on the part of this country and other Powers would be the surest and speediest means of insuring peace. In reply to a question from the body of the hall, the lecturer gave a succinct statement of affairs as they existed prior to secession, and reproduced some of his well-known arguments in proof of the right to secede. Secession, he showed, was no new thing, but had been frequently threatened, desired, and almost consummated many times before it actually took place; and on more than half of those occasions it was the North that was about to dissolve partnership with the South, and not the South with the North. Mr. Kershaw concluded an able and comprehensive speech by pointing out some of the opposite characteristics of North and South—characteristics so essential that they lie at the bottom of all true union of Governments and peoples, and when opposed, as in the case of North and South, utterly destructive of all political well-being.

The following resolution was then proposed by a working man named Benjamin Jackson, and seconded by another working man named Russell Buckley, and carried with only one dissentient:—

'That in the opinion of this meeting the war in America is an injury to the world, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination unless by means of the moral influence of Europe. We, therefore, earnestly urge upon the Government of this country to enter into communication with the European Powers to concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace.'

The meeting, which was very orderly though very enthusiastic, broke up in a friendly and peaceful manner a little before eleven o'clock.

FREMONT'S PROGRAMME.

WE subjoin General Fremont's letter to the committee, accepting the nomination of the Cleveland Convention:—

GENTLEMEN: In answer to the letter, which I have had the honour to receive from you, on the part of the representatives of the people assembled at Cleveland, May 31, I desire to express my thanks for the confidence which led them to offer me the honourable and difficult position of their candidate in the approaching presidential election.

Very honourable, because, in offering it to me, you act in the name of a great number of citizens, who seek above all things the good of their country, and who have no sort of selfish interest in view. Very difficult, because, in accepting the candidacy you propose to me, I am exposed to the reproach of creating a schism in the party with which I have been identified.

Had Mr. Lincoln remained faithful to the principles he was elected to defend, no schism could have been created and no contest would have been possible. This is not an ordinary election; it is a contest for the right even to have candidates, and not merely, as usual, for the choice among them. Now for the first time since 1776, the question of constitutional liberty has been brought directly before the people for their serious consideration and vote. The ordinary rights secured under the Constitution and the laws of the country have been violated, and extraordinary powers have been usurped, by the Executive. It is directly before the people now to say whether or not the principles established by the revolution are worth maintaining.

If, as we have been taught to believe, those guarantees for liberty which made the distinctive name and glory of our country are in truth inviolably sacred, then there must be a protest against the arbitrary violation which had not even the excuse of necessity. The schism is made by those who force the choice between a shameful silence or a protest against wrong. In such considerations originated the Cleveland Convention. It was among its objects to arouse the attention of the people to such facts, and to bring them to realise that, while we are saturating Southern soil with the best blood of the country in the name of liberty, we have really parted with it at home.

To-day we have in the country the abuses of a military dictation without its unity of action and vigour of execution. An administration marked at home by disregard of constitutional rights, by its violation of personal liberty and the liberty of the press, and, as a crowning shame, by its abandonment of the right of asylum, a right especially dear to all free nations abroad, its course has been characterised by a feebleness and want of principle which has misled European Powers, and driven them to a belief that only commercial interests and personal aims are concerned, and that no great principles are involved in the issue. The admirable conduct of the people, their readiness to make every sacrifice demanded of them, their forbearance and silence under the suspension of everything that could be suspended, their many acts of heroism and sacrifices, were all rendered fruitless by the incapacity, or, to speak more exactly, by the personal ends for which the war was managed. This incapacity and selfishness naturally produced such results as led the European powers, and logically enough, to the conviction that the North, with its great, superior population, its immense resources, and its credit, will never be able to coerce the South. Sympathies which should have been with us from the outset of this war were turned against us, and in this way the administration has done the country a double wrong abroad. It created hostility, or at best indifference, among those who would have been its friends if the real intentions of the people could have been better known, while at the same time it neglected no occasion for making the most humiliating concessions.

Against this disastrous condition of affairs the Cleveland Convention was a protest.

The principles which form the basis of its platform have my unqualified and cordial approbation, but I cannot so heartily concur in all the measures which you propose. I do not believe that confiscation, extended to the property of all rebels, is practicable; and if it were so, I do not think it a measure of sound policy. It is, in fact, a question belonging to the people themselves to decide, and is a proper occasion for the exercise of their original and sovereign authority. As a war measure, in the beginning of a revolt, which might be quelled by prompt severity, I understand the policy of confiscation; but not as a final measure of reconstruction after the suppression of an insurrection.

In the adjustments which are to follow peace, no consideration of vengeance can consistently be admitted.

The object of the war is to make permanently secure the peace and happiness of the whole country, and there was but a single element in the way of its attainment. This element of slavery may be considered practically destroyed in the country, and it needs only your proposed amendment of the Constitution, to make its extinction complete.

With this extinction of slavery the party divisions created by it have also disappeared. And if in the history of the country there has ever been a time when the American people, without regard to one or another of the political divisions, were called upon to give solemnly their voice in a matter which involved the safety of the United States, it is assuredly the present time.

If the Convention at Baltimore will nominate any man whose past life justifies a well-grounded confidence in his fidelity to our cardinal principles, there is no reason why there should be any division among the really patriotic men of the country. To any such I shall be most happy to give a cordial and active support.

My own decided preference is to aid in this way, and not to be myself a candidate. But if Mr. Lincoln should be nominated, as I believe it would be fatal to the country to indorse a policy and renew a power which has cost us the lives of thousands of men and needlessly put the country on the road to bankruptcy, there will remain no other alternative but to organise against him every element of conscientious opposition with the view to prevent the misfortune of his reelection.

In this contingency, I accept the nomination at Cleveland, and as a preliminary step, I have resigned my commission in the army. This was a sacrifice it gave me pain to make. But I had for a long time fruitlessly endeavoured to obtain service. I make the sacrifice now only to regain liberty of speech, and to leave nothing in the way of discharging to my utmost ability the task you have set for me.

With my earnest and sincere thanks for your expressions of confidence and regard, and for the many honourable terms in which you acquaint me with the actions of the committee,

I am, gentlemen,

Very respectfully and truly yours,

New York, June 4, 1864. J. C. FREMONT.

ORDNANCE STORES OF SOUTHERN MANUFACTURE.

(From the Augusta Constitutionalist, May 24.)

WE are kindly furnished by Colonel Rains with some facts in regard to Government operations at this place—which are not contraband, as the facts have mostly appeared in England. The works are under the immediate control of Major J. P. Girardey, the former popular commander of the Washington artillery of this city. The magnificent works at this place will long be a monument to the skill and enterprise of the Ordnance Department, and to the unwearied energy of Colonel Rains. Those who know the magnitude of the operations, the immense amount of material used and constructed, and the disadvantages under which Colonel Rains and Major Girardey have laboured, will think it difficult to overrate the zeal and enterprise of those officers. The following is a memorandum of war material supplied to our armies from the Government Works at Augusta, under the command of Colonel Rains, within the past two months, viz.:—

One million four hundred thousand small-arm cartridges.

Six thousand rounds fixed ammunition (shot and shell attached to cartridges for field batteries).

Two thousand five hundred Colonel Rains's percussion hand grenades.

One thousand five hundred rifle shells for field artillery.

Fifty-four tons eight and ten-inch shot and shell for columbiads.

One hundred tons of gunpowder.

Three complete batteries of brass 12-pounder Napoleon guns, with carriages, limbers, caissons, harness, equipments, ammunition, travelling forges, &c.

One battery of three-inch rifle and banded iron guns, and twelve-pound bronze howitzers.

One battery of four twelve-pound howitzers. The above two batteries being complete at all points, with carriages, limbers, caissons, harness, ammunition, equipments, &c.

All of the above guns, except the rifle battery (for General Morgan), were sent to General Johnston's army, which has altogether sixteen complete batteries of brass guns, which were mainly manufactured in every part at the Government Foundery and Machine Works and Gun-Carriage Department in this place.

The most of these batteries are composed of the new 12-pounder Napoleon guns, introduced in the service of the war by the present Emperor of the French; of these, over eighty-five, weighing in the aggregate more than fifty tons, have been cast at the Government Foundery in this city, mainly within the past year. In the same period, over five hundred tons of the first quality of gunpowder have been made at the Powder Works and distributed throughout the Confederacy.

In addition to the foregoing, there has been an immense number of small-arm cartridges, cartridge bags, fixed ammunition, canteens, haversacks, horse-shoes, time fuses, and percussion-caps made at the Arsenal, as well as large amounts of signal rockets, portfires, sets of artillery harness, infantry accoutrements, &c., manufactured within the past twelve months.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

(From the Richmond Whig of June 15.)

BOTH Houses of Congress adjourned sine die on Tuesday. They meet again in November next. In the proceedings of Tuesday the following is a portion of the most important enacted in the Senate:—

The Senate concurred in House amendment to the Bill requiring the Secretary of War to detail disabled officers and soldiers to fill the offices of marshals and clerks in the military courts. House amendment was to substitute for 'soldiers' the words 'non-commissioned officers and privates.'

The House joint resolution of thanks to Major-General Forrest and the officers and men under his command, for the recent victory at Tishomingo Creek, was, under the rule, referred to the Military Committee.

A message from the President announced that he had approved and signed the following Bills:—

An Act to authorise the formation of new commands, to be composed of supernumerary officers who may resign to join such commands, and to limit and restrict the appointment of officers in certain cases.

An Act to authorise the appointment of quartermasters and assistant-quartermasters, and of commissaries and assistant-commissaries in the provisional army in certain cases.

An Act to amend an Act entitled 'An Act to Prohibit the Importation of Luxuries,' &c., approved February 6, 1864.

An Act to provide and organise a general staff for armies in the field.

And three Acts emendatory of the Act to establish military courts for armies in the field, and to define their powers.

A message was received from the President vetoing the Bill allowing further time to persons within the enemy's lines to fund their Treasury notes.

PETERSBURG AND ITS DEFENCE.—The Richmond Whig of June 15 says: 'It will now be Grant's effort to precipitate a large body of his forces upon Petersburg, which he may fancy of as much importance to Richmond as Grand Gulf was to Vicksburg. Herein he again errs; but to what extent we shall not be in haste to inform him. There are contingencies which may serve ere long to enlighten him, and that very suddenly. Around Petersburg there are fortifications superior to those which held Ulysses in check for two months before Vicksburg. Behind these there is no incompetent leader, with an army disgusted and disheartened at his imbecility. The first engineer of the age, and a field captain equal to any in the world, are there; his troops have unbounded confidence in him; he has proved them and him on many fields; he awakens enthusiasm as none other can awaken it; and when Grant comes in contact with him, he will find another master—nay, two masters; for the day which sees the bulk of Grant's army on the south side will find the two best heads, and the two bravest, purest, and most magnanimous hearts on this continent opposed to him, and that will be a field day indeed.

BARBAROUS WARFARE OF THE FEDERALS.—The following resolution was passed by the Confederate Senate on June 3:—'Resolved: That the President be requested to make an exposition, through our Commissioners abroad, to the various European Powers to which they may be accredited, of the violations of the rules of civilised warfare and of the atrocities committed by the Government and armies of the United States in the prosecution of hostilities against the Confederate States of America.'

they were known to have made illegal profit out of their official position. Within the legislature itself, the tone is given by men who, if not dishonest, are under constant temptation to be so; who feel that the price of a vote is really a matter of great importance to them; and who, keenly alive to the temptation, are not disposed to pronounce a severe judgment on those who succumb to it. Thus, without asserting that Americans are less honest than Englishmen, it is easy to understand why in the Northern States, where to be a gentleman is to be disqualified for popular favour, and excluded from or heavily weighted in the race of political ambition, the standard of pecuniary integrity in the State Legislature, in Congress, and in the official departments both of the State and Federal Governments, is very much lower than it has ever been in England since the days of WALPOLE.

The natural tendency of democracies to corruption has been greatly aggravated in America by the infamous maxim introduced by President JACKSON: 'To the victors belong the spoils.' Since that unlucky sentence was uttered, each succeeding President has treated the offices in the public service, from the highest to the lowest, from the Secretaryship of State to the village postmastership, as rewards not of public but of party usefulness; not as positions in which a servant of the people was to render himself as valuable as possible to the country, but as places in which a man who had worked hard for the dominant faction might receive payment out of the public purse. The habit of looking forward to a vast multitude of such places demoralised, not a few trading politicians in each State, but tens of thousands of busy citizens, who worked each four years for their party, not in pure love of its principles, but in the hope of getting a place for themselves. The mass learned to look upon jobbery as a matter of course; a large percentage of the population became jobbers themselves. When places were not to be had, contracts might be given; and the practice of rewarding active partisans, whether in municipal, State, Congressional, or party elections, by giving them orders to furnish coal for the postal steamers or cordage for Government vessels, or to pave the streets, or to feed the paupers, grew and increased, until the business of contractor became identified with that of politician, and lucrative contracts were looked upon as the natural perquisites of diligent electioneerers. The extent to which malversation of this kind was carried can hardly be conceived in this country; and we were almost incredulous when, in 1859, some Congressional documents relating to a few jobs of rather more than usual effrontery were made the subject of comment in the newspapers, and Englishmen learned that the highest officers of the Union were capable of mixing themselves up in transactions with which, in England, no respectable attorney would choose to meddle. The Southern statesmen were, as a class, elevated, both by fortune and character, above this sort of dirty work. They were neither to be bribed by a railway bill, nor to be silenced by a coal contract. But they had to work with Northern tools, and to treat them much as the Duke of WELLINGTON, when Irish Secretary, dealt with the Hibernian supporters of Government. In the Federal Government, and in a great majority of the States, the Democratic party had enjoyed a long monopoly of power; and it is beyond question that the jobbery of which they were guilty had a share in diminishing their popularity, and driving a number of honest and respectable men into the arms of a party which, anxious to have its turn of plunder, denounced the actual plunderers in no measured terms, and which, having as yet had no opportunity of stealing, enjoyed the reputation of honesty.

The Republicans came into power hungry with a fast of many years. It was a bitter mortification to them that they were instantly deprived of a large slice of the plunder they had promised to their followers by the secession of the South. But they consoled themselves with the thought that war would afford a far richer harvest than could possibly have been reaped in peace; and they inaugurated their career by an inter-State job on a magnificent scale. While the fate of the Union trembled in the balance, they availed themselves of what they professed to consider the temporary absence of the Southern representatives and Senators, by enacting, in the MORRILL tariff, the most impudent job by which a wholesale bribe was ever offered to a numerous class. The merchants and manufacturers of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England accepted the gratification, and gave their support to the Government. War was resolved on and commenced. We know how many it has slain, starved, ruined; if we knew how many it had enriched, perhaps we should better understand how it is that this slaughter and devastation have found in certain quarters such loud and lavish commendation, support, and applause.

Mr. CAMERON managed the commissariat and supplies of the army, it must be confessed, better than our Government did at the outbreak of our last war—and he reaped a large and very substantial reward. The extravagance of his profit awakened the envy of his colleagues, and after he had realised a very ample fortune, he accepted the embassy to Russia, and left to Mr. STANTON the lucrative opportunities of the War Office. To improvise a navy and a transport service in a few months, economy must be thrown to the winds; and Mr. WELLES was too shrewd a man not to feel that, when all idea of economy is thus dismissed, the family of the Minister who conducts the extravagance may as well profit by it as any one else. How great the opportunities afforded to a speculative genius by the control of unlimited issues of paper, we need not suggest to those who have watched the fortunes of Mr. CHASE. The Ministers have been as indulgent to their friends and followers as they have been lenient to themselves. Ships have been chartered at rates of unprecedented liberality; orders have been given without limit as to price or stipulation as to quality; to haggle about dollars or scrutinise the value of the wares supplied would indicate an ungenerous caution, a suspicious stinginess very unbecoming in transactions between friends. Every one who could plead Republican principles has claimed a right to share the profits offered by the opening of so vast a field of peculation as is afforded by the demands of a great war and the needs of an army of 800,000 men; and the claims have been dealt with in so liberal a spirit, that Mr. LINCOLN—if, as it would appear, he has kept his own hands clean in these transactions—might almost say with NICHOLAS, 'I am the only honest man in my opinions.'

A quarrel among the plunderers of New York has revealed a choice little nest of scandals which is really worth observation, not as anything peculiarly or exceptionally shameful, but as a fair sample of the state of things throughout the North-eastern States. The Evening Post had fallen foul of Mr. THURLOW WEED, who was charged with having made some iniquitous profits out of the chartering of the Cataline. Mr. WEED is the editor of the Albany Evening Journal, and the manager of the Republican party. This position he has held for a quarter of a century, during which he has certainly avoided office, and is said to have refused other more lucrative if less reputable rewards. In fact, he enjoys the credit of having conducted elections, directed negotiations, carried on intrigues, kept a party together, done all its dirty work, gone through all the rascality, shame, and vulgarity, the vice, meanness, and filth, inseparable from the position of backstairs director of a party in a democratic country, from pure love of the trade. He is naturally very indignant at the insinuation that he has accepted fee or reward, that he has handled pitch from any other motive than pure love of defilement; and he falls upon his assailants tooth and nail. We need not trouble our readers with his personal vindication, or his vituperation of his allies; but we must not pass unnoticed the testimony of a Republican to Republican purity and principles—the character given by THURLOW WEED to Mayor OPDYKE, General FREMONT, and some of their friends and supporters.

One firm, we find, sold large quantities of goods to the Government, not on contract, but in the open market. It is curious to see what the profits in the open market are. One lot, bought for $18, is sold for $216. Another lot cost $50, and is sold to Government for $262. For less than $17 worth of brass pins, Government pays $189. On an outlay of $787, the dealers reap a net profit of $3,211; and $1,552 brings in $4,111. These are but specimens extracted from a long series of accounts of the same character. Such are the fruits of Republican 'loyalty.'

OPDYKE, late Mayor of New York, has rendered valuable assistance to the Federal power and spiteful opposition to the Democratic municipality of the city. He was appointed on a committee of enquiry into a claim for $190,000 preferred by his own son-in-law, after swearing that he had no sort of interest in the matter. The claim was paid. A subsequent dispute occurs between the parties interested, and OPDYKE comes forward to swear that he had a very large interest in the claim. If this be true, it is not difficult to believe that the ex-Mayor has 'made more money by secret partnerships' in contract rascalities 'than any fifty sharpers in New York.'

The story about General FREMONT is less intelligible. It appears that that gallant officer and Presidential candidate is in the habit of indebtedness, and that his pecuniary embarrassments injured his chance in 1856. To improve his position for the present contest, a peculiar scheme seems to have been devised. The General owns certain real or imaginary mines, and these were made the basis of a Mareposa joint-stock Company. By means of the shares of this Company—of which the $2,400,000 worth were handed over to Mayor OPDYKE and one or two other friends—the General's debts were paid; and, if the Mareposa mines should turn out no more real than the wealth of the South Sea Islands, the shareholders may at least, in return for their money, enjoy the satisfaction of having rescued a possible President from the humiliation of arrest for debt.

Such are the Republicans painted by themselves; not by a disappointed partisan or unprincipled renegade, but by the most active, devoted, and disinterested of their party. After a few more exposures of this sort, we shall probably hear no more of the theory that the election of Mr. LINCOLN was a protest against democratic corruption; and even those revelations of which we are already in possession may help to explain why the statesmen and gentlemen of the South abhor a connection with the North, not merely as a political danger and a national disgrace, but as partaking of the loathsomeness of personal contamination.

The Battle of Parties.

IT was scarcely to be expected that the present Session would close without at least one vigorous effort on the part of the Opposition to storm the strongholds of power. Skirmishes and partial assaults to reconnoitre the position had been frequent, and they demonstrated such weakness that it might not be unfairly concluded the Cabinet would be compelled to yield at the first serious summons to surrender. The failure of the Conference seemed an excellent opportunity, and accordingly on Monday last Mr. DISRAELI moved a vote of censure in the form of an address to HER MAJESTY regretting the failure of the Conference, and also that the Government had not succeeded in upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, and that it had 'lowered the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace.' Two amendments were proposed, one by Mr. KINGLAKE, suggesting, in lieu of the last paragraph, a congratulation that HER MAJESTY has not been advised to commence hostilities; and the other, proposed by Mr. NEWDEGATE, was that England should adhere to the proposition made by the neutral Powers in the Conference as to the division of Slesvig. The first of these amendments might, in substance, be accepted by both sides, since neither party is desirous of war; and for the same reason the amendment of Mr. NEWDEGATE would be rejected both by the supporters of the Government and by the Opposition. Therefore, had the Government desired, they could not have shirked the responsibility of meeting Mr. DISRAELI's motion as a direct vote of censure.

The Opposition had many elements of success. Their assault was directed against the weak point of the Government. To have proposed simply a vote of want of confidence would have given the Government a better prospect of defence. The Ministers might have admitted that their foreign policy had been a failure; but, on the other hand, they might have pleaded that their financial legislation had been successful, and that the country, though not in good repute abroad, was eminently prosperous at home. But, as we have said, the Opposition wisely confined its attack to the weak point in the position of the Government. The failure of Earl RUSSELL's foreign policy is patent to all the world. There is no concealing or explaining away the taunts of a unanimous foreign press, which, however much Englishmen may affect indifference to such criticisms, tingle in their ears, and which are not supposed to be considered altogether undeserved even by some of Earl RUSSELL's colleagues. Whatever opinions may be held as to the merits or general demerits of the Government, no one could think that a change at the Foreign Office could be for the worse. It may be Earl RUSSELL's misfortune, or it may be his want of tact, but it is certain that no Minister could fail more completely than he has done. His policy is denounced in Denmark, is a by-word in Germany, and is treated with contempt by Russia. The Poles charge him with having betrayed them. We will not say that he has sensibly affected the alliance between this country and France; but it is undeniable that he has suspended that cordial amity which is the best security for the peace of Europe. Everywhere he has interfered, and everywhere his interference has bred ill-will to England. Unquestionably he was animated by generous and friendly sentiments towards Greece, yet the Greeks are not so kindly disposed towards us as formerly. No Englishman who values his good name will defend the way in which Earl RUSSELL treated the Government of Brazil. Even in America it must, we should think, be conceded that the diplomacy which has been unfriendly to the South without conciliating the North, is a failure. We may admit, for argument's sake, that Earl RUSSELL is the victim of circumstances; and that he was called upon to direct the foreign policy of England at a period when no Minister, however farseeing and cautious, could help giving offence to almost every Government in Europe and America. But this does not affect the position that Earl RUSSELL's policy has been so complete a failure, that it is not conceivable that a change in the Foreign Office could be for the worse.

Thus the Opposition had the opportunity of placing the Government in a dilemma from which it would be difficult to escape. It was impossible to deny the non-success of Earl RUSSELL's foreign policy; and if the Government would not consent to throw Earl RUSSELL overboard, every member of it became responsible for his Lordship's failures, and yet parties are so evenly balanced that the FOREIGN SECRETARY could not be displaced without breaking up the Cabinet. It is not, therefore, surprising that the Conservatives should have anticipated, and the Liberals have feared, the success of the vote of censure. Now, whatever may be the result of the coming division, we think we shall not be contradicted in saying that the chances of the Government have improved since Monday. We do not question the great ability of Mr. DISRAELI; but it seems to us that on Monday night he did not make the best use of a golden opportunity. Mr. DISRAELI never had a more fitting occasion for using that terrible weapon of sarcasm, of which he is undoubtedly a master. We expected, and we venture to say our expectation was general, that on Monday night he would have exposed the blunders of Earl RUSSELL, and held him up to the ridicule of the House. Instead of so doing, Mr. DISRAELI discussed very ably the Danish question; but this was not the strong point for the Opposition. The fact is, that the Opposition, so far from being able to declare that they would have defended the integrity of Denmark or have upheld the treaty of 1852 by force of arms, admit that they would not have counselled war with Germany, and assert only that, by a more consistent policy, the danger, and even the need, of such a war would have been averted; but, taking the actual position, they are not prepared to do more for Denmark than is HER MAJESTY'S Government. When it comes to a question of policy on the Danish question, the difference is not so perceptible; and therefore we think Mr. DISRAELI would have damaged his opponents more by confining his attention to the manner in which Earl RUSSELL had endeavoured to carry out the policy of peace. Perhaps the right honourable gentleman will do so when he makes his reply.

We do not wish to lend ourselves to the cry that the Conservatives have no policy; for undoubtedly they have one that is essentially different from that of the Liberals; but we think they would have done better if they had exhibited greater boldness in announcing their policy. If they hold that under no circumstances was England justified in preventing the invasion and conquest of Slesvig, why not state it? There is, no doubt, a point at which they would deem it right for England to resist the aggression of Germany: well, then, why not state it? Why not tell the country, and tell Germany, what they conceive to be our duty and obligation to Denmark? To have a policy and not to proclaim it is, in its effect on public opinion, as bad as having no policy at all. We have seen this in the United States. The Democratic party has contented itself with attacking the Republican policy without avowing its own policy, and the result has been that the Democratic party has almost ceased to be a power in the Union. We should unfeignedly regret to see the great Conservative party in this country lose its just influence, for then party lines would be obliterated; and when party ceases to reign, faction takes its place. It is not, then, in an unfriendly spirit that we offer these comments on the great battle of parties that is now going on, and that we remind Conservatives that, in politics as well as in war, the most consummate generalship is not alone sufficient to ensure success, but that courage is as indispensable as conduct.

An article appears in the Pays of the 30th ult., examining the pretensions of Mr. Lincoln's Government to the title of philanthropists and emancipators. The writer examines at length the various statements made by Mr. Lincoln with regard to the constitutional question of slavery; his famous manifesto liberating all slaves with rebel owners; and, coupled with that, the proclamation giving the South a hundred days to return to their allegiance. 'Let us appreciate,' he says, 'the high morality of this policy. Slavery, that odious institution, was to be a means of national reward—a premium on loyalty. In Europe, good services and devoted conduct receive crosses and decorations for their recompense. Mr. Lincoln gave to his faithful subjects, as a sort of Legion of Honour, the right to hold slaves.' In the same journal of the 3rd inst. a very clever exposé is made of the rotten principles upon which Mr. Chase's last loan of $70,000,000 is founded. Subscribed for in greenbacks, and bearing 6 per cent. interest, payable in gold—that is, about 15 per cent. at the present rate of money—it only relieves the temporary pressure on the Treasury by imposing upon it a fresh ultimate burden. It pays for a temporary accommodation by changing $70,000,000 worth of non-interest-bearing loan into the same sum at an interest of 15 per cent.

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK.

New York: June 24, 1864.

NORTHERN EXULTATION AT THE REPORTED CAPTURE OF PETERSBURG—THE ACTUAL SITUATION—THE POSITION OF SHERMAN—THE FEDERAL LOSSES IN VIRGINIA—THE ANTICIPATED DRAFT—A RETURNED REGIMENT—THE RETURN OF MR. VALLANDIGHAM—HOW MR. LINCOLN SUPPORTS HIS FRIENDS.

SATURDAY was a jubilant day with the Federals at Washington, and the exultation ran all over the North. Grant had, according to the reports of that day, 'flanked' something at last to some purpose—had crossed the James River with his whole army, marched on Petersburg and taken it; and was only measuring the days which might intervene before he would march into Richmond. It was not Grant himself that said all this, but it was said for him, and, Saturday being a steamer day, the whole story with all its embellishments went out to Europe. Gold fell 3 or 4 per cent. on the strength of the news. But here is another steamer day, and the fever fit is over and the chill come back. The papers, even from this side, will tell you the story better than I can. For the fourth or fifth time—how many is it?—General Grant fell Lee's positions, attacked them, and, terribly repulsed and quitting one for another, was on the true road to success at last. He had broken up his campaign from the North, and found himself, with an admitted loss of 50,000 men and a real loss of many thousands more, south of James River, with Lee again before him, where there is no more 'flanking' to be done, unless he tries to go back the way he came. Now was to come the great triumph suddenly; but intelligence to-day is, that Petersburg, which was but two days ago positively captured, and yesterday announced to be at the mercy of the Federal army, is found to be thoroughly covered by the Confederate army under Beauregard, and so powerfully defended that it can only be taken by a direct assault with masses of men driven up against a series of entrenchments, with the prospect of a renewal of the murderous losses in which a similar desperate attempt resulted at Spottsylvania Court House, and with as little prospect of success.

Accompanying this news comes the official acknowledgment by General Sherman, that the report which he sent to Washington, and which the Secretary of War republished yesterday, of the precipitate retreat from before him of the forces of General Johnston, was a mistake—the blunder of his field officers, who seem to have told what they wished rather than what they saw.

The situation of Sherman is believed to be growing very critical. Instead of advancing triumphantly into Atlanta, the fear is expressed that Forrest—who lately won a brilliant victory over General Sturgis at Memphis, routing an army of eight thousand men and capturing many prisoners, trains of provisions, and a large number of guns—is closing on Sherman's rear, and giving uneasiness at Washington that he may be compelled to attempt retreating and fail to get off his army. It is difficult to get accurate accounts of what is going on in Georgia, but it is very certain that the Confederates are well pleased with the aspect of affairs in that quarter, and the Federals are very uneasy.

The value of the success of General Hunter at Staunton has been rapidly lost to the Federals. His forward movements have been checked by the miscarriage of General Sheridan's cavalry raid; and not only are the Confederate defences in that quarter thought to be secure, but General Hunter himself is in a critical position, and will be content to stay where he is if he can be permitted to do so. Butler too has come to grief, and gold to-day is over 200.

On all the great lines of attack converging towards Richmond the news to-day is auspicious to the arms of the Confederacy.

I have said above that there was an admitted loss to Grant's army of 50,000 men in getting overland to his present position. The Federal bulletins say it was only 20,000 in all. The Confederates insist it was nearly 100,000. Two pieces of evidence came out simultaneously the other day which show by comparison and the use of the rules of arithmetic that the Federal losses were at least 50,000 by their own account. The chairman of the military committee in the House stated that General Grant had received additional forces since he crossed the Rapidan, by which his army was brought up to nearly its original numbers. On the same day the chairman of the military committee in the Senate, replying to an intimation of the want of energy in supporting General Grant, stated specifically that up to that date forty-eight thousand additional men had been sent to him. It follows that forty-eight thousand men, if there were no more sent, scarcely repaired the losses.

There is certainly to be a draft on or soon after July 4. The terror of it is so great, that the Volunteer Committee of the city councils, after publicly stating the impossibility of raising the money on the credit of the city to secure volunteers, have reconsidered their recommendation to suspend the offer of bounties, and proposed the raising of another two millions, in addition to the six millions the city has already expended to purchase recruits and at least reduce the perils of drafting for the whole number required. Congress is to-day engaged in debating the point whether it will not be necessary, in order to keep up the army, to repeal the commutation clauses, and demand the peremptory service of every man drawn, or the furnishing by him, at his own cost, of an accepted substitute.

The return of the 9th regiment last week has a damping effect on the spirits of unwilling soldiers. This regiment has had, since it first went into the field, of original members and recruits, 2,700 men. Of these 81, being 70 privates and 11 non-commissioned officers, have come back. There are left in the field 124 officers and men. The war has therefore used up of this regiment about 2,400 men, and the same tale is told of other returning regiments. Nearly all the original soldiers are left on the battle-fields. The South is still unsubdued, and the Northern soldiers come back to find their own civil liberties overthrown. No wonder there is no more volunteering.

The Fremont men are organising clubs with great spirit, as though they meant to contest the election against Mr. Lincoln to the last.

The Administration has been puzzled by the sudden return of Mr. Vallandigham. You will remember that he was tried by a military commission last summer, by order of General Burnside, for a speech made at a Democratic meeting in Ohio, and, being found guilty of speaking against the Administration, was forcibly sent into the Confederacy by order of the President, whence he made his way into Canada, where he has since been residing in exile. One day last week, the order for his banishment remaining uncancelled, he appeared at a Democratic meeting in Staunton County, and made a strong speech against the policy of the Administration. He has since been chosen in his district a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at Chicago. His tone is that of utter defiance of the President, renewing his declaration that the act of the President in expelling him from the country was one of lawless tyranny, and giving notice that any attempt to rearrest him will be resisted by all lawful means, and the power of the President over the liberty of loyal citizens fully and thoroughly tested. In this he has the support of the whole Democratic party, and the President finds himself in a very awkward dilemma. He must submit to have his sentence annulled and his authority put to contempt, or he must cause Mr. Vallandigham to be apprehended to undergo the remainder of his sentence. But the case is different now from what it was when Mr. Lincoln was the chief of a united party wielding all the power of the Government to put down their adversaries. The dominant faction there is now divided between contending chiefs, and the most powerful of these justifies its revolt by arraigning Mr. Lincoln for the usurpation of despotic powers in acts against personal liberty and the freedom of speech, of which these proceedings against Mr. Vallandigham are an example. The Administration must accept humiliation or encounter a great danger. It will, I think, choose the safer course of letting Mr. Vallandigham alone, employing that policy as the strategy of party to throw confusion among its adversaries, as it is supposed that Mr. Vallandigham's influence at Chicago will be in favour of peace nominations, and discord there is Mr. Lincoln's game and gain. An attempt to arrest Mr. Vallandigham under the old sentence would create a terrible excitement, which would go far to bring together elements of opposition to Mr. Lincoln, which might otherwise find it difficult to unite with each other. Many of the best advisers of the President are urging him, very earnestly, to waive pride and temper, yield to necessity, and consult party prudence, by abandoning his case against Mr. Vallandigham as wholly and silently as his adversaries will permit.

Congress is hard at work in getting its indispensable business into shape, so as to adjourn within a few days. The Presidential canvass is beginning to be active, and every member is impatient to get home and attend to his own little interest in making a President who has so many good things to distribute among his friends, and has shown so amiable a disposition to help those who help him. The zeal of Mr. Lincoln's friends has been quickened of late by several significant intimations from Mr. Lincoln of what he expects from those who expect anything from him. One example will suffice. Not long ago members of Congress from Indiana waited upon him with a formal petition, asking him to remove Mr. Holloway, the Commissioner of Patents at Washington, who is a citizen of Indiana and votes there, for opposing the election of Mr. Julian to Congress, Mr. Julian being a regularly nominated candidate and an adherent of the President. The answer was, that Mr. Holloway must support Mr. Julian 'unconditionally,' or be turned out of office. The President added, in the way of an indirect application of this rule to a case most intimately interesting to himself, that nominations, in Indiana are just as binding as nominations 'at Baltimore.' Reciprocally, the nomination at Baltimore will be held to be entitled to 'unconditional' support like that in Indiana; and whoever holds back will be turned out of office. Members are, therefore, fairly warned that, to get or to keep anything in the gift of the Government, they must do something for Mr. Lincoln. It is time they were off and at work, for there is a dangerous revolt in the bosom of his own party against these practices, as well by those who hold them to be odious and dangerous, as by a much more numerous class, who see but a faint chance of getting into office, and of insuring the favour of the patron of officeholders, if servility and service buy security in place for the incumbents.

GRANT'S CHANGE OF BASE—RICHMOND TAKEN 'ON PAPER'—GRANT AND M'CLELLAN—THE DEFENCES OF RICHMOND—PETERSBURG—THE DEFEAT OF STURGIS—REPORTS FROM VIRGINIA.

ON the afternoon of Wednesday last Stanton condescended to let us know that Grant had changed his base to the south of the James; but this then was old news. One week ago we knew of the contemplated movement through the Richmond journals, and letters since received kept us well advised of what was going on. A portion of the army proceeded to its new destination on transports, while the balance proceeded to Charles City and vicinity, and crossed the river near that point. The 18th Corps struck for Bermuda Hundred, where it arrived on the afternoon of Tuesday. The latter went direct on transports. This was the advance of the army, and Grant honoured it with his presence. When the latter arrived at the Hundred he was met by General Butler, who showed him all through his entrenchments, and gave him his valuable ideas generally as to what ought to be done. Grant must have relished this exceedingly, especially when it is remembered that he hates Butler as badly as do some of his friends in New Orleans and Norfolk. We are told by Mr. Stanton that the crossing of the James was effected 'without loss or accident.' It is possible that for once the Secretary has told the truth; but if so, then Madame Rumour has fibbed most shamefully. Nor is it rumour alone that has told us differently, for it was reported on Wednesday, on the authority of a leading Black Republican M.C. from Pennsylvania, that the change of base cost Grant not less than 20,000 men. It is likely, however, that this number included the losses at Coal Harbour, the battle of which, it is now said, was fought to obtain possession of the Gains Mills and White Oak Swamp Roads, which were used by M'Clellan while crossing with his army in 1862. It is known, however, that Grant failed in this endeavour, and he was finally compelled to cross at a point still further from the coveted prize.

The fact that Lee permitted him to cross at all is commented on by the Abolition press as a sign of weakness in the Confederate commander. The flank and rear of Grant's army, it is argued, could have been fallen upon successfully by a large army; and because Lee did not do this, he is rated as greatly reduced in men, 'or else strangely lacking in enterprise.' The latter clause is excellent, considering how handsomely General Lee has baffled his antagonist at every step of the road since he crossed the Rapidan, and actually forced him to change his base across the waters of the James.

But it must be that Lee is 'weak.' This is the generally accepted theory of the editorial campaigners; and because he is weak he is a doomed man! Yes, 'there is now a reasonable prospect that Richmond may be captured.' Indeed, according to another authority, 'failure is impossible. Grant is now in very positive possession of the only line of supply that was left to keep Lee's army alive. Petersburg, of course, is his. Fort Darling can offer no effectual resistance, and with its fall Richmond cannot stand twelve hours after the gunboats go up. . . . Lee dare not assume the offensive, and must retreat, though this, too, is dangerous.' You will see from this kind of talk that Richmond is 'as good as taken;' Lee's army is in danger of capture or annihilation; and, of course, the Confederacy is, for the hundredth time, 'on its last legs.' What says gold to this? Active, at 197½. What says cotton? Middling—146! Comment is unnecessary.

But the assured victors cannot even wait until the great victory is officially announced. One would suppose that, with the 'positive' certainty of immediate success in an effort that has been nearly three years in progress, the campaigners would be satisfied with crowing after the capital was assuredly won. But not so. They must have it 'taken' on paper, as it has been several times already; and accordingly we were told on Thursday that Fort Darling was captured, that the obstructions in the James had been removed, and that the fleet was ascending the river. On Friday the news was even more astounding. Grant's immense army on the south side had created a great panic in Richmond; the remainder of the prisoners and public archives had been removed further south. Congress had adjourned sine die, in great haste and confusion; and the capital was being evacuated by citizens and the army at the topmost rate of speed. Of course, Richmond was taken without an additional blow, but Lee and his army had escaped.

This is the kind of stuff we are fed upon, but only the fools swallow it. At the same time there is more warrant for the extravagant predictions and rumours that are put forth than at any other period of the 'On to Richmond' farce. The best military talent in the land has pronounced the James River route the route to Richmond, and if the city could not be taken by that route it could not be taken at all. The campaign of Grant, the most formidable expedition yet set on foot, has fully demonstrated that Richmond was not to be taken from the north, and an effort, backed by all the power of the Administration, will now be made to capture the city by the only route that remains. M'Clellan has been on the identical ground, it is true, and failed; he has been nearer to Richmond by five miles than Grant is at present, and failed, but he has always charged his failure to the rascally treatment of the War Department in not supporting him. Had it done so, the 'Young Napoleon' declares positively that he would have taken Richmond, but as it was he didn't.

Grant can make no such charge. The War Department is sending him every man at its command. He has already lost 90,000, but this number has been made up probably to the extent of 40,000, so that his present army on the James cannot be less than 140,000 men, including, of course, those that were already there.

It is not denied that M'Clellan two years ago had 130,000 men near the precise locality where Grant is operating, and the simple query at present is, can Grant with his 140,000 men do anything more than M'Clellan did? Is it not reasonable to suppose that he will not do as much? Two years have made important additions to the defences of Richmond, south as well as north; and, all the gasconade of the press aside, is it reasonable to suppose that Richmond will be captured, or that Lee will be 'compelled to retreat?'

So far as the defences of Richmond are concerned, they are a sure safeguard against either of these mishaps, and the only really serious thing in the way of Lee is his communications. If he can maintain even one of these intact—keep it open through every obstacle—he can defy Grant 'all summer,' and all the following winter too. But he will doubtless have his hands full. The cavalry with Grant is energetic, artful, and daring, large in number, and well officered, and already are they on their errand of seizing every line of communication south from the Confederate capital. What they can hold they will, what they cannot they will aim to destroy so thoroughly as to prevent its use or possible repair. In this respect Grant is far more highly favoured than M'Clellan was, while the former is also taking a broader scope generally for the enveloping of Richmond than ever M'Clellan did.

The Danville Road is decidedly the most important running out of Richmond. This road connects with the whole South and West, and should it be seized and destroyed, or permanently held by Grant, a siege of the city would commence in dead earnest, and with every probability of a favourable result. This is what Grant aims at—it is Vicksburg all over again; but it remains to be seen whether Lee will permit him to repeat successfully that operation with Richmond. For my own part, I have the most unwavering confidence in the commanding general of the Confederate army, and believe that he will prove more than a match for Grant.

Petersburg will, no doubt, this time fall, if it has not already fallen. It is essential to the invader's progress, and so is it also to Lee's safety; the latter can scarcely afford to see his antagonist in full possession of that important city, and, if occupied, it must be retaken let the sacrifice be what it may. This presupposes that Lee intends to defend Richmond to the last, and such is, no doubt, his intention.

Staunton has been abandoned by the Federals, and Hunter, reinforced by Crook and Pope, was pushing on for Lynchburg. The capture of the Danville Road has been intrusted to Averill. Hunter's forces are stated to amount to 16,000 men. Sheridan has not been heard from authentically for a week, but it is understood that his raid is confined to the line of the James River Canal. The chief portion of Grant's army is some sixteen miles from Richmond. Should he make Petersburg his head-quarters, he will be twenty-two miles distant.

Sherman is reported as moving on Kenesaw, but his prospects are nowhere considered very brilliant. Indeed, the farther he penetrates into Georgia, the worse he appears to be off, and in greater danger of never being able to return. Some of the veterans who defeated Banks are understood to be on their way to join Johnston, but the Federals, under A. J. Smith, are said to be moving to intercept and drive them back. This Smith is the general who came to time, and saved Banks's army from total annihilation. He has been appointed to supersede Sturgis. We learn since that his (Sturgis's) force consisted of 3,000 cavalry, including the famous Grierson, 5,000 infantry, and sixteen pieces of artillery. There was also a long wagon train, which was lost together with the artillery. The defeat was a total one, and the rout of the Federals complete. They fell back upon Memphis, which was also the point of their departure. The Confederate force which defeated these Vandals is understood or believed to have been the one now on the way from Red River to join Johnston. I apprehend Smith will be very shy of running foul of that party, and the fair inference is that it will reach Marietta (Georgia) in perfect safety.

Sturgis, the defeated and decapitated general, had a good squad of nigger troops with him, who, as usual, got in a mess, and thus, it is alleged, added to the severity of the disaster. The Herald, I see, asserts that the victory over Sturgis 'amounts to very little,' whereas it was one of the most brilliant and important in its results ever achieved in the West. It was one of those thorough victories which any general might be proud of, while it adds to the difficulties of Sherman immensely. The Herald is whistling to keep up the courage of its deluded readers.

I had written thus far when the Confederate accounts of the battle came to hand. These locate the engagement at Tischamingo Creek, and describe it as 'one of the most signal victories of the war for the forces engaged.' The Federal loss is put down at 2,000 in killed and wounded; also 1,000 prisoners, 20 pieces of artillery, and 250 wagons and ambulances. The victory is described in these despatches as the sole work of the forces under Forrest, who had since arrived at Selma for the purpose of taking a hand in the game with Sherman.

The capture of Petersburg is announced this morning. Such a result was inevitable unless Lee had seen fit to throw a heavy force into the town to man its defences, and this, for reasons best known to himself, he declined to do. Since the taking of the town, however, he has sent forces to the west bank of the Appotomax, and the inference is that this position will be held: indeed, it would not surprise me if we had news of a battle in that vicinity at any moment.

The Danville Road, at last advices, had not been interrupted, and it is now very doubtful whether it can be successfully held by the forces which seek to threaten it. If Lee gives up the loss of the direct road south from Petersburg, we may be sure that he will so effectually guard the interior (Danville) road, that its capture will be impossible. But I have no idea that he intends to submit to the quiet occupation of Petersburg by Grant, and we may therefore soon look for stirring intelligence from that quarter.

The Confederates have disappeared from before Butler's front, going probably to join the forces on the west of Petersburg.

The cavalry raids are not all working as smoothly as Grant would desire. Stanton has been very silent about Sheridan, but we now hear through Confederate sources that he has been met by the cavalry under Fitzhugh Lee and Hampton, who defeated him so severely that he was compelled to leave his dead and wounded on the field. Five hundred prisoners also were taken. Sheridan appears to have had any quantity of work cut out for him. He was to operate on the James River Canal, the Virginia Central Road, and also on the road between Lynchburg and Richmond. Where he was when he met with defeat is not stated in the brief despatch, but this is immaterial.

The News of to-day looks for disastrous news from Averill, Hunter, and Crook, who, at last accounts, appeared to be marching on Lynchburg. It regards the expedition as certainly approaching a trap, extrication from which will be difficult.

Gillmore has been relieved of his command. It was clear that he and Butler did not agree, but whether it was because of this, or the failure to take Petersburg when the movement was set on foot last week for this purpose, is not known. Poor Gillmore! He peppered the inhabitants of Charleston for months, and banged away generally among the forts which defend that city for a year, but only to meet with disgrace and a taunt from the Senate that he 'had done nothing.' Next we hear of him under Butler, doing nothing, it is alleged as usual, and now we hear that he is ordered to report at Fortress Monroe.

The death of Bishop Polk is announced in a Federal despatch from Sherman's army, but I can find no confirmation of it through Confederate channels. It is possible that it is an error. The World this morning is not so jubilant as it has been for a day or two past, and warns the country that it 'must prepare for possible disappointment.' I reckon so; for Grant is at this hour no nearer the capture of the Confederate capital than he was a month ago.

But why deceive the people at all? Why are the Herald, Times, and other lying sheets assuring their readers this morning that the game is up, and that the occupation of Richmond may be 'counted by days?' Is it to keep up the spirits of the people? If so, why does the $75,000,000 six per cent. gold loan go a-begging? The bids for this loan did not reach the amount asked for, despite the 'six per cent. in gold,' and this is pretty clear proof as to how the people feel upon the subject of Richmond's capture and the downfall of the rebellion. The bids made ranged from under par to 7 prem., but Chase has declined to accept any under 4 prem. This gives him about $10,000,000, or sufficient to last him, say, for ten days. It is now said that Chase will 'make proposals for a foreign loan,' from which it is supposed the rumours that arrangements were already or nearly concluded for one were unfounded.

Gold this (Saturday) morning has opened at 95¼; exchange on tenders, 216.

Middling cotton touched one dollar and a half a pound yesterday; but the market seemed a little giddy, and buyers withdrew.

THE HON. T. B. KING.—The Savannah Republican gives the following sketch of Mr. King, who lately died in Georgia:—'Mr. King was a native of Pennsylvania, but came to Georgia about forty years ago, when quite a young man. He married the daughter of the late Colonel William Page, of St. Simon's, and settled in Glynn county. He was a gentleman of liberal education and enlarged views, and about the year 1832 entered political life. In that or the succeeding year, we think, he represented the county of Glynn in the State Legislature; and, in 1834, and for several successive years, he was the State Senator from the same county. In politics he was of the Crawford and Troup school. When the nullification question arose, Mr. King allied himself to the State Rights party in Georgia; and in 1838 was elected, with the entire State Rights ticket, a member of Congress. He was in the House of Representatives for several consecutive terms, and was identified with the Whig party which elevated General Harrison to the Presidency. In Congress Mr. King was very useful, especially in connection with naval affairs and ocean steam navigation. It is admitted, on all hands, that he would have made an excellent Secretary of the Navy. On the accession of General Taylor to the Presidency, Mr. King was appointed Collector of the Port of San Francisco, in which office he continued about two years. During his whole career he was devoted to the cause of internal improvement, and he exercised much influence in the councils of the State, and also of the nation. On the secession of Georgia, he was sent by the State as Commissioner to Europe, and his correspondence in that capacity was marked by great ability and practical acquaintance with the laws of trade and the rules for international dealing. Ardently devoted to the cause and institutions of the South, he has passed away just as that cause seems on the verge of triumphant success, but leaving behind him the record of a useful man and a sagacious statesman.'

MONEY MARKET AND JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.

(From the Owl, July 6.)

THE crisis which the great development of the principle of joint-stock association has long threatened us with seems at last to have begun.

Political difficulties, and the troubled state of the Continent, have no doubt had some effect in bringing about this state of things; but the inherent rottenness of some of the schemes is in many cases quite sufficient to account for their collapse.

Among the most important of these undertakings which have just failed, under discreditable circumstances, is the 'Conference Corporation of London (Limited).' This company was formed for the supply of peace goods to the Continent, and started with an apparently respectable Board of Directors, while for a short time their shares were quoted at a premium. But it gradually oozed out that a gentleman of the name of Russell had been elected chairman, and the public began to lose confidence. The stock drooped, and, notwithstanding vigorous attempts to rig the market, at last fell to such a low point that transactions were impossible to arrange on any terms. Great dissensions arose at the Board, and finally, on last Saturday week, the concern was made bankrupt. The books have been placed in the hands of Messrs. Derby, Disraeli, and Co., the well-known accountants, but the assets are expected to be nil. . . . . .

We regret to hear unfavourable rumours respecting the position of that old-established concern, the Liberal Joint-Stock Government Corporation. It was established in the year 1859, and has given great satisfaction. But, latterly, we fear overtrading and an unfortunate connection with the Conference Corporation of London (Limited), by whose operations it has lost heavily, have materially endangered its position. The accounts are at present under examination, and will be reported on during this week. If the report be unfavourable, we understand that it is the intention of the Board to call a general meeting of the shareholders, and by their votes to stand or fall; and, if necessary, though we trust this may not be the case, to resign and allow the election of a new body of directors. We would suggest that if the gentleman whose name we have mentioned as having so deeply injured the credit of the insolvent Associated Conference Company were to resign, matters might, perhaps, be placed once more on a satisfactory footing.

THE ART OF BLOCKADE-RUNNING.—The Southern Correspondent of the Times, lately in Europe, has returned to the Confederate States, and written an excellent account of how he ran the blockade into Wilmington. His concluding observations are, we submit, worthy the attention of our Government. He says:—'I cannot leave the subject of the blockade without pointing the moral which is being taught by it, and which it is inconceivable why England does not take more pains to understand. There is no nation upon earth which has a tenth of the interest which England has in closely observing the working of the only blockade on a large and imperial scale which has been established since the introduction of steam navigation. It can scarcely be pretended that information in regard to the system of showing lights to guide incoming vessels, concerning the infinite intricacies of detail which experience has taught to the blockade-runners of Wilmington, Charleston, and Mobile, concerning the most favourable conditions of sea, sky, and tide for running out or coming in, can be obtained otherwise than upon Southern soil. Yet it is not deemed by the British Admiralty to be a matter of importance that they should be represented at Wilmington and elsewhere by one of our most accomplished naval officers. It is humiliating to be told, as I have been again and again, that no such emissary will be sent without the consent of Mr. Adams, and that this consent he will never give. But, great as is the concurrence of opinion among Englishmen in America upon the importance of this subject, there is but too much reason to fear that this blockade will be unheeded and its lessons unlearnt by competent English officials. It is idle for me to point out that not only is there opportunity for a naval officer to gain invaluable information, but that, in spite of the answer given three months ago by Lord de Grey to the effect that it was not important to send military officers to the South by reason of the inferiority of its resources, it is the opinion of every English officer who has been to the Southern States that there is infinitely more to be learnt here during a month than in the North during a year. It is, I think, pretty well admitted by this time that, as regards construction of guns or the architecture of ironclad Monitors, England has nothing to learn from the North. But in every other department of the vast science of war there is more to be gained as regards the present struggle by studying it from a Southern than from a Northern point of view. As an instance, it may be asked whether there is upon this continent anything to be compared in interest with an inside view of Charleston and Fort Sumter. It is the opinion of experienced judges that the earthworks around Richmond are the most formidable that modern experience has known. The novel system of defensive works around Mobile is described to me upon excellent testimony as the most instructive of studies for a military engineer. I know not whether there be truth in the assertion which has greeted me here that two French officers of ability are momentarily expected in the South, but it has always appeared to me incomprehensible that the French Emperor should have shown an apathy about this war which, mistaken as I hold it to be in England's case, admits, so far as England is concerned, of easy and plausible explanation.'

HOW MR. LINCOLN SHAKES HANDS.—The correspondent of the New York World, in his account of Mr. Lincoln's late visit to Philadelphia, writes: 'Mr. Lincoln passed some time in shaking hands. This salutation is with him a peculiarity. It is not the pump-handle "shake," nor a twist, nor a spasmodic motion from side to side, nor yet a reach towards the knee and a squeeze at arm's length. When Mr. Lincoln performs this rite, it becomes a solemnity. A ghastly smile overspreads his peculiar countenance; then, after an instant's pause, he suddenly thrusts his "flapper" at you as a sword is thrust in tierce; you feel your hand enveloped as in a fleshy vice, a cold clamminess overspreads your unfortunate digits; a corkscrew burrows its way from your finger nails to your shoulder, the smile disappears, and you know that you are unshackled. You carefully count your fingers to see that none of them are missing, or that they have not become assimilated in a common mass.'

MODEST.—The New York Herald thus commences a leader entitled 'The Herald and its Contemporaries:'—'It is very well known wherever newspapers are taken that the Herald is the best newspaper published in this country. It is also a better newspaper than any published in Europe.'

THE BATTLE OF MAY 12.

(From the Correspondent of the Richmond Sentinel.)

Hanover Junction, May 23, 1864,
Camp of Pegram's Brigade.

On yesterday I concluded my letter with some account of the heavy battle of Tuesday, the 10th, near Spottsylvania Court House.

The tremendous slaughter then inflicted on the enemy, and his total want of success, seemed to have greatly cooled his ardour, for on Wednesday all was quiet along the lines, except the habitual skirmishing, which, from its familiarity now, scarcely attracted attention. Towards evening, rumours of the retreat of the entire force of the enemy were freely circulated; and certainly from past experience, in our many conflicts with the 'Grand Army,' such a move seemed highly probable. Never before had the enemy been so universally repulsed with such tremendous slaughter, and so little impression made upon our lines. Up to this time the enemy's losses were estimated to be at least 35,000 men, while our own did not reach one-fourth that number.

Congratulations passed freely from mouths that on the morrow were to be sealed in death; and many a patriotic heart beat with joy in anticipation of the end of our great struggle, which, on the bloody 12th of May was frozen in the cold grasp of the unrelenting monster.

May 12, 1864, will be ever memorable and ever remembered, as the day of one of the most bloody and obstinate struggles which have ever marked the annals of war, or added fresh horrors to this most cruel contest.

Before daylight we were moved up to the support of Hayes' and Stafford's brigades in the works, and scarcely had the grey tinge of morning begun to dispel the darkness of a damp and drizzly night, when, after the three cheers which we knew to be the precursor of a charge, and a brief scattering fire on our right, we were astonished and mortified to see the troops in that direction pouring out of the works in the woods, showing that the enemy had there broken a passage. The enemy poured their concentrated masses through the gap, and, moving on the flank with great celerity, were swiftly driving all before them in panic and confusion.

Instantly Pegram's and Gordon's brigades were formed a few hundred yards to the rear of, and at right angles to, the line of works. All saw that a crisis was upon us. If we failed, the consequence would be disastrous in the extreme.

In this exigency General Lee rode forward in front of our line, his position being opposite at the time to the colours of the 49th regiment of Pegram's brigade, and only a few yards from where your correspondent stood. Not a word did he say, but simply took off his hat, and as he sat on his charger, I never saw a man look so noble, or a spectacle so impressive.

At this interesting moment our gallant Gordon, spurring his foaming charger to the front, seized the reins of General Lee's horse, and, turning him round, said, 'General, these are Virginians! These men have never failed! They never will! Will you, boys?' Loud cries of 'No! no! General Lee to the rear.' 'Go back! Go back!' 'General Lee to the rear!' burst from along the lines; and as one led the General's horse to the rear, General Gordon gave the command, 'Forward, charge!' And with a shout and yell the brigades dashed on, through bog and swamp, and briars and undergrowth, to the breastworks. The enemy, struck with dismay, start to flee; but we are upon them like a storm, and their first line of battle withers before our impetuous onset and the cool marksmanship of our men. 'Hurrah! the works are ours!' But we stop not. Some of the enemy, more obstinate than the rest, show fight with bayonets, but it is soon over; and dashing over the first line we pursue to the second. Here we encounter another Yankee line of battle, but our onset is not stayed. They stand their ground until our scattered but still advancing line gets within ten steps, and then, without having fired, turn to run. Few, however, escape; and ordering those who remain to surrender and go to the rear, a portion of the brigade, the 31st and 49th Virginia regiments, dash on, and form our line more than one hundred yards in advance of our outside entrenchments.

The fight there is hot, but we wish to give the rest of our men time to form in the works behind us, ere falling back. So we lie down, and for two hours repel every attempt to move us, although exposed to both front and flank fire. Seeing a strong line moving on our right flank, and our men having established themselves in the works, we fell back to the outside lines, and there remained until night, repulsing every attempt to charge us out. The works which the enemy had captured contained an angle in the form of an A, with the point towards the enemy; and in the charge our line was not sufficiently long to extend over the extreme points of the angle. Attempts were made by other portions of our troops to recover this point; but they failed to dislodge the enemy, who maintained possession of about three hundred yards of our works in that quarter. This angle was made in order to embrace a hill in our works. Many say this was bad engineering; but I am no judge of that.

During the night we fell back, under orders, and threw up a line of entrenchments across the base of the 'A,' thus throwing out the point held by the enemy.

Considering the length of time we were actively engaged—from daylight until dark—and the large force opposed to us, our loss was small, not exceeding 400 men in the brigade. I place the enemy's loss low when I estimate their killed in front of our brigade at 200.

We recaptured a number of pieces of artillery, but, for some reason unexplained, they were not brought off when we changed our line, and again fell into the hands of the enemy.

The loss in Johnston's division was probably between 3,000 and 3,500, including over 2,000 prisoners. I suppose our whole loss, during the day, amounted to between 6,000 and 7,000. The enemy state their loss at from 18,000 to 25,000. They captured 20 pieces of artillery. This is their 'great victory!'

A Wish.—The Boston Commercial Bulletin, after announcing the purchase of the Mersey rams by the British Government, adds: 'To our own Navy Department this will be a great relief, for they are as unprepared to meet the rams as they are to capture the Alabama and her consorts. We wish they would prevail upon the British Government to purchase the rebel ram Albemarle also, and the other rams in Charleston and Mobile.'

Federal Losses.—A despatch dated Mobile, May 29, and published in the Wilmington Journal on May 31, says: 'A Confederate major who crossed over yesterday reports as follows: Seven gunboats and seven transports were captured on Red River, and the whole number of prisoners in Arkansas and Louisiana was 16,000. On the 7th instant two gunboats and three transports were captured on the Colcirzo River.'

The Danish Blockade.

Kiel, July 2.

The blockade was reestablished on June 26; but the passage from here through the Canal, via Tonning, is open.

France, Mexico, and the United States.—The New York Herald says: 'The Mexicans are evidently averse to the ruler forced upon them by the bayonets of the French, and they will plot and rebel against him until the time shall have arrived when we shall come forward and rid Mexico of those filibusters who have so unceremoniously seized upon and overthrown her Government. This piece of work we have before us.'

Messrs. Lincoln and Johnson.—The age of statesmen is gone; the age of rail-splitters and tailors, of buffoons, boors, and fanatics, has succeeded. God forbid that we should reproach Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Johnson with the narrowness of their early circumstances, which precluded opportunities of culture. But when men are proposed for the highest and most responsible offices in the Republic, there necessarily arises the question of fitness—a complex question relating in part to training and antecedents, but turning, in the main, on the possession of present qualification. The problems presented for solution within the next four years are more complex and difficult, they require a larger grasp and deeper penetration than any which have ever been offered to the consideration of statesmen. But Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson are both men of mediocre talents, neglected education, narrow views, deficient information, and coarse, vulgar manners. A statesman is presumed to be a man of some depth of thought and extent of knowledge; profoundly versed, if not in history, at least in the policy, resources, and aims of all the leading contemporary governments of the world; in the character, qualifications, and idiosyncrasies of their public men, and in the bearings of their most important measures and projects on the development of commerce, the growth of civilisation, and the progress or retardation of free principles of government. It is needless to say that neither in this sense nor in any high sense are the Republican nominees statesmen. Except a superficial knowledge of our domestic politics, such as may be picked up in the newspapers, and in intercourse with the vulgar herd of office-seekers, Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson have no attainments to distinguish them from the mass of ordinary citizens. —New York World, June 9.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

THE money market has been in a very quiet state throughout the week. The debates in Parliament, and the tone of foreign political affairs, cause a partial pause in business, and consequently the transactions continue limited. We are now so closely approaching the payment of the dividends, that it is expected the rates of discount will be easier in the course of the next few days. The late high range of quotations at the Bank has had the effect of repressing speculation, and has brought things into a comparatively healthy situation. No doubt there will be a tone of quietude until after the holidays, which will commence immediately the issue of the present contest in the House of Commons shall have been ascertained. The terms for first-class bills are slightly touching downwards, and the quotation is about 5¾ per cent. From that point up to 6 per cent. is the fair average price in Lombard Street, and the supply of capital is if anything gradually increasing. The efflux of the dividends will, it is thought, have a favourable influence; and should the season for the harvest continue propitious, it is not improbable we shall see a further rise in all classes of securities. The profits of the Joint Stock Banks during the first half-year it is said will be enormous. They must certainly have concluded a good business, and having taken in money at 5 per cent., and charged 9 per cent. the margin of return has proved necessarily large. From 6 per cent., the highest quotation for short loans, at the Stock Exchange, the rates have dropped to 4 and 4½ per cent., and the quantity of capital seeking employment has become augmented.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The tone of the market for bullion and specie has rather improved during the week, and instead of withdrawals from, bullion is again finding its way into, the bank, though at present the amount sent in has not been large, about 160,000*l.*, whilst there has not been any taken out. The arrivals of specie have been very small, only 69,605*l.*, of which 25,000*l.* was from New Zealand; 2,813*l.* from the Brazils, and 41,792*l.* from New York. The Baroda steamer, which sailed for the east on the 4th, took out only 27,099*l.*, of which 20,992*l.* was in silver and 6,107*l.* was in gold. This amount was divided as follows: 607*l.* to India; 25,992*l.* to China, the Straits, and Japan; and 500*l.* to Galle. The silver market remains very quiet; the bar silver brought by the last West Indian mail has been sold at 61⅛*s.* per oz. being a decline of ⅛*d.* on previous sales. The few Mexican dollars brought by the same packet have been purchased for the China market at 64*d.* per oz., which is an advance of ¾*d.* on prior sales. Telegraphic advices from Melbourne announce that the shipments of gold during the month of May amounted to 24,750 oz., of the value of 99,000*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock market has not been particularly animated during the week, business being to a great extent impeded through the same causes that have influenced the market for some time past, viz., the unsettled state of political affairs both at home and abroad. The dealers show no disposition whatever to speculate, consequently the transactions were greatly restricted. Prices, however, have slightly improved, and the market closes remarkably firm, consols being at 90⅞ to ¼ ex div. for money, and the same for the account, which is an advance during the week of ⅛ per cent. Exchequer Bills keep steady, the March issue at 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis., and those of June at 5*s.* dis. to par. There has been rather more animation exhibited in the Foreign Stock market, and in most instances prices are better. There has been a rise in Greek stock of 1½ per cent., of ¼ to ½ per cent. in Spanish, and ¼ per cent. in Turkish, but Mexican are unchanged. Greek closed at 25¼ to 25¾; Mexican, 44⅞; Spanish Passives, 29¼ to 29½; ditto Certificates, 10¼ to 10¾; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 90½ to 91½; and those of 1862, at 68 to 68½ ex div.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The evident indications of the failure of Grant's campaign in Virginia has given more life to the transactions in this security; the value has, moreover, advanced, and we close firm at 67 to 68.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—Some slight misapprehension having lately arisen about the position of holders of the Confederate 7 per cent. Loan, who wish to convert their bonds into cotton, permit me to reply through your columns to the inquiries which are addressed to me on this subject.

The Confederate Government is bound by the terms of the contract with Messrs. Erlanger & Co. to deliver the cotton in redemption of these bonds, after peace 'in the ports of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, or New Orleans;' during the war 'at points in the interior of the country within ten miles of a railroad or stream navigable to the ocean.' In practice, the Confederate Government even exceeds its obligations under this contract; and to facilitate the conversion of the bonds, it has provided that certain duly authenticated certificates of deposit should have the same validity as the bonds themselves; and in exchange of these certificates it has in many cases delivered cotton, when it was practicable, at the ports of shipment, the bondholders defraying the additional expense of inland transportation. This has been extensively done at the port of Wilmington, although that port is not among those specified in the contract, until the stock of Government cotton there has become exhausted. The proximity of that port to the theatre of operations in Virginia and Georgia, and the consequent strain upon the means of transportation for military purposes, will render it difficult, for the present, to replenish the stock, and it is therefore probable that the Government will be temporarily unable to accommodate bondholders at that point. At other ports, notably Mobile, these reasons do not apply, and one vessel, exclusively engaged in exporting Loan Cotton, has just completed her fifth round trip between Mobile and Havana. Other vessels plying between neutral ports and Texas, have also been eminently successful.

I need scarcely repeat that the Government is anxious, not merely to comply with the strict letter of its contract, but to afford to the bondholders in addition every facility and convenience consistent with its military necessities. In consequence of this liberal policy, over 300,000*l.* have already been converted into cotton, or exchanged for certificates for that purpose. The semi-annual interest, and the dividend of the sinking-fund, due September 1, upon the amount of the loan remaining in circulation, is now in the hands of the agents of the contractors, Messrs. J. Henry Schröder & Co.—Yours respectfully,

C. J. MCRAE,
Agent for the Loan.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Although there have been a few more dealings this week in American Government and Railway Securities, they have been chiefly caused by a pressure of sales, holders appearing disposed to clear themselves of this description of property, in the present unsettled state of affairs in America, more particularly as all the recent accounts have proved so very unsatisfactory as to the progress of the Northern army. Prices have generally declined, and the tendency is towards further depression. The business transactions comprise Virginia State six per cent. Stock at 31. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, at 76, 74, 73½, 73, and 73½. Do. do. Pennsylvania section, at 73½ and 73¼. Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 50 and 51. Illinois Central seven per cent., at 55¾. Do. $100 shares, $90 paid, at 39 dis. Do. do., all paid, at 60, 58½, and 57; and Pennsylvania Railway, second mortgage, at 83.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Within the last day or two business in the Railway Share Market has become exceedingly active. Dealings to a large extent have taken place, and prices have generally advanced, the market closing with a firm tendency. Since Wednesday last there has been an improvement in Great Eastern, Great North of Scotland, West Midland (Oxford), and West Cornwall, to the extent of 3 per cent.; of 2½ per cent. in Midland; of 2 per cent. in Great Western, Metropolitan, London and Blackwall, North Eastern (York), South Devon, and South Eastern; of 1½ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire; of 1 per cent. in Bristol and Exeter, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Glasgow and South Western, Chatham and Dover, London and North Western, North Eastern (Leeds), Sheffield, North British, North Eastern (Berwick), and North London; and of ½ per cent. in East Anglican, Stockton and Darlington, and North Staffordshire. In foreign railway shares a good business has also been transacted at rather improved quotations, and for those connected with the British possessions, there have been increased inquiries, prices showing a general improvement, the market closing very firm.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At a general meeting of the proprietors of the Land Mortgage Bank of India, Mr. Laing in the chair, the resolutions agreed to at the previous meeting on June 17, authorising the Directors to exercise the powers given by 'The Companies' Seal Act,' were adopted and confirmed. The Chairman briefly alluded to the great loss of time, expense, and inconvenience that would be incurred were the directors compelled to have every mortgage executed in the usual way, stating that, by the adoption of these resolutions, the Board of Directors would be empowered to stamp the mortgage with the official seal of the Company, at any of the branches, thereby making the document complete. Special seals, the Chairman added, would be prepared for each of the Presidencies—Bengal, Madras, and Bombay. At the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders in the London and Brazilian Bank, the accounts showed that the net profits for the half-year have been 15,531*l.*, after making due allowance for bad debts and contingencies. The chairman, Mr. Bischoffsheim, stated that out of the net profits it was proposed to pay a dividend of 1*l.* 1*s.* per share, being equal to 6 per cent. per annum. Some of the branches had only been open a very short time. In Brazil and Oporto, the business was steadily increasing. Some of the shareholders complained of the changes at the head office, but it was not to be expected that they could get good officers without paying them well. He could not promise them any reduction under that head, as when the business increased the charges would also increase. The report was then unanimously adopted.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the Silver Indiarubber Works and Telegraph Cable Company, Dr. Beattie in the chair, resolutions were unanimously passed authorising an increase of the capital of the company by 500,000*l.*, of which one half is to be immediately called up, making with the original capital issued 500,000*l.*, the nominal capital being 1,000,000*l.*, and changing the name of the company to 'The India Rubber and Gutta Percha and Telegraph Works Company (Limited)'—At an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders of the London Bank of Scotland, the agreement entered into by the directors for an amalgamation with the Mercantile and Exchange Bank was confirmed. It appears that 15,000 new shares out of the 18,000 will be issued to the shareholders of the amalgamated bank at 2*l.* premium. The half-yearly meeting of the Colonial Bank took place to-day, when the report presented showed that the net profits for the half-year, after making allowances for bad and doubtful debts, amounted to 36,217*l.*, out of which an ordinary dividend of 6 per cent. for the half-year ending December 31 last, being at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum; and a bonus of 1 per cent. was declared, leaving a balance to be carried forward of 1,217*l.*

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 3,000,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were: To Calcutta, 1,632,000 rupees; to Bombay, 1,200,000 rupees; and to Madras, 168,000 rupees. The minimum price was, as before, 1*s.* 11½*d.* per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* 11¾*d.* on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 171 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* 11¾*d.* will receive about 31 per cent.; on Bombay at 2*s.* about 21 per cent.; and all above those prices in full.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the Opera Company (Limited), the proposed capital being limited in the first instance to 30,000*l.*, in 6,000 shares of 5*l.* each. The Company is formed for the purpose of carrying out with extended provisions the objects sought to be obtained by the English Opera Association, which is now in process of winding up. The first operations of the Company are to consist of the production and performance in this country of English operas, of adaptations from the foreign schools, and other musical purposes. The directors have entered into a contract with Mr. Gye for the use of Covent Garden Theatre for a term of years during the autumn and winter months.—The Residential Chambers Company is announced, with a capital of 70,000*l.*, in shares of 20*l.* each, for the purpose of erecting a building in Victoria Street, in which apartments are to be let, either furnished or unfurnished, in suites of two or three rooms. Public dining, smoking and reading rooms are also to be provided. The prospectus of the Société Générale de l'Empire Ottoman, an important institution for Turkey, has been issued under very influential auspices, with statistics especially approved by the Ottoman Government. The capital is to be 2,000,000*l.*, in 100,000 shares of 20*l.* each.—The Colonial and General Gas Company (Limited) are in the market for the purpose of raising a capital of 250,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 25*l.* each. Concessions have already been obtained for Murcia, Ajaccio, Bastia, Ferrol, and St. Espiritu, and negotiatiations for similar purposes in various other localities are being carried forward.—The prospectus has been issued of the Gas Products Utilising Company (Limited). It is proposed to raise a capital of 150,000*l.*, in 15,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The object is to purchase the freehold manufactory, plant, and business belonging to Mr. A. A. Croll, of the Metropolitan Alum Works, and to develop them on an extensive scale.—The St. Nazaire Company (Limited) has just been brought forward, the capital asked for being 600,000*l.*, with a first issue of 300,000*l.* in 15,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The objects of the undertaking are the purchase of land at St. Nazaire, a rising port on the French Atlantic coast, to carry out certain concessions granted by the municipality, and to make improvements in the town and port. It will also make advances on merchandise and other property.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Business in these departments still drags on heavily, and but little improvement is expected until the debate at present occupying Parliament is disposed of. Meantime holders of produce in general show confidence in the market, and do not hurry forward supplies. Prices are, consequently, secured from any serious depression, although they are in some instances easier. Deliveries of most kinds of produce continue very good, but owing to recent liberal arrivals, stocks of some few articles have increased, and generally the quantities in store are quite up to the average of late years, although not in all cases equal to those of 1863. During the past few days the grain trade has manifested increased heaviness, and foreign wheats have given way fully 1*s.* per quarter, the trading of the market being still downwards to-day. The crop accounts do not return the estimates of the yield so high as recently, and those most general place it at not above an average, and therefore short of last year's. Oilcake has been in good demand, and has realised steady prices. In provisions a moderate business is passing. Foreign butters have risen in value 4*s.* per cwt. Of American there is none here. The cheese trade is quiet. The first arrivals of new grass from Holland have opened at 50*s.*, 54*s.* being an average price. The quality is reported as fair for first imports. The bacon market is dull, and Irish sides are offering at 70*s.* on board. The only American bacon here consists of short middles, rib in, for which 42*s.* per cwt. may be quoted. There is still an absence of demand for navy provisions. Petroleum has been sold to a fair extent, and there are still buyers of American refined at 2*s.* 2*d.* on the spot. For the last three months 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 4½*d.* are present quotations. Crude remains at 19*l.* 10*s.* per tun. Linseed oil has further declined to 37*s.* 6*d.*; pale rape offers at 45*s.* 6*d.*, and brown at 42*s.* 6*d.*; olive oil meets only a retail demand at late rates; sperm is quoted 70*l.* per tun nominally. Gums of all kinds are firm, and Arabics realise very long prices. In drugs there is not much passing. Camphor is obtainable at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cwt. for best quality, and lower rates are expected. Chemicals are also dull. Chlorate of potash is scarce, and brings 13½*d.* to 14*d.* Sulphate of quinine, after declining to 5*s.* 8*d.*, has advanced to 6*s.* per oz. for French. The sugar market has further receded 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt., but there were indications of improvement in the demand to-day. Coffee maintains its value firmly. Tea sells heavily and at barely late rates. There have been several fluctuations in the metal trade. English tin has been reduced 4*l.* per ton, making common block 104*l.*, and bar 105*l.* Banca has been sold at 106*l.* down to 103*l.*, and closes with holders asking 104*l.* Scotch pig iron, after dropping to 57*s.* 6*d.*, has to-day recovered to 58*s.* 6*d.* per ton.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 6.—There has been rather an increased trade demand for cotton during nearly the whole of the week, and in the early part prices for all the best descriptions advanced from ⅛*d.* to ¼*d.* per lb.; but although there has not since been any further material rise, prices remain exceedingly firm. Business is to some extent impeded in consequence of the general anxiety with reference to the result of the pending debate in Parliament; and till it is decided whether the country is to be disturbed this year by a general election, it is not likely that there will be much doing. American cotton continues to be enquired for, but holders do not appear very anxious to part with their stocks under existing circumstances. The sales this week have amounted to 70,000 bales, of which 30,000 have been on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time have been 1,469,210 bales, against 1,089,710 to the corresponding period of 1863. There have been imported this year, so far, 1,170,873 bales, against 793,666 bales to the like period last year. This year the exports have been 261,279 bales, whilst in 1863 they were 233,574 bales. The quantity taken for consumption this year has been 865,800 bales, against 532,837 bales last year. The quantity taken on speculation this year has been 216,110 bales, and in 1863 245,200 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 321,524 bales; at the same period last year there were 367,972 bales. The latest quotations were, American descriptions, 29½*d.* to 30½*d.*; Peninsular, 28½*d.* to 30⅝*d.*; Maranhams, 30½*d.* to 32*d.*; Maceio, 28½*d.* to 28¾*d.*; Bahia, 28¼*d.* to 28½*d.*; Egyptian, 19*d.* to 36*d.*; Smyrna, 19*d.* to 21½*d.*; Surat, 10*d.* to 24*d.*; Bengal, 13¼*d.* to 17*d.*; Scinde, 13¼*d.* to 16¾*d.*; and Japan, 20½*d.*

The markets at Manchester have this week shown some improvement, in consequence of the better aspect of the Liverpool cotton market. Shipping yarns have been largely looked after, and some extensive orders have been placed, in most instances at an improvement of about ½*d.* per lb., and the market closes with considerable firmness. The chief orders have been for the India, China, and German markets. The market for Scotch yarns remains quiet; but for good qualities of yarn for the home trade the market is very strong, at a slight improvement in prices, and ordinary yarns have been a little more enquired after. The market for cloths has also assumed a more cheerful appearance; a greater disposition has been shown to transact business on a moderate scale, particularly for goods in stock, but at prices not beyond those current last week. The dealings, however, have been far more limited than would have been the case had not manufacturers, in almost all cases, demanded higher rates. Although the market has improved very much in its general aspect, the aggregate of business has been moderate, most of the transactions having been for small lots on hand. Among the purchasers have been some from the Brazils. It is stated that the production of goods is at the present time rather considerable, and there are 368,000 operatives at work, of whom 288,869 are on full time; but it is rumoured that some mills at Stalybridge and other places are likely soon to be stopped again. The closing quotations were—26⅞ in. grey printers, 8*s.* 5*d.* to 8*s.* 8*d.*; 27 in. ditto, 13*s.* 9*d.* to 14*s.* 10½*d.*; ⅞ grey madrapollams, 7*s.* 7½*d.* to 10*s.* 1½*d.*; ⅞ grey printers, 11*s.* 7½*d.* to 18*s.*; ⅝ grey shirtings, 12*s.* 9*d.* to 26*s.* 9*d.*; water twists, 2*s.* 5*d.* to 3*s.* 6*d.*, according to quality; and mule twists, from 1*s.* 10*d.* to 4*s.* 6*d.*

HEAD QUARTERS ARMY, VIRGINIA, Oct. 30, 1863.

COLONEL,—I have received the Pistol and Cartridges, and am obliged to you for your kindness in forwarding them.

As I shall have no opportunity to thank Mr. Adams for his handsome present, I beg that you will do so for me, in my name, whenever it may be in your power.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

Colonel J. GORGAS, Chief of Ordnance, Richmond. (Signed) R. E. LEE, General.

RESPECTFULLY forwarded to Robert Adams, Esq., London, England, thanking him on behalf of General Lee for the handsome Pistol so presented.

I beg to add that it is superior in workmanship and finish to any other Pistol that I have ever seen.

(Signed) J. GORGAS, Colonel, Chief of Ordnance.

OF THE

SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY,

DESIGNED

CHIEFLY TO MINISTER TO THE SPIRITUAL NEED OF OUR NOBLE DEFENDERS,

IS the Representative of all Denominations of Christians, who, through it, lay their Offerings of Piety upon the Altar of Patriotism, and lead the Soldiers of the Country to become the Soldiers of the Cross.

ITS HEADQUARTERS ARE PETERSBURG, VA.,

With Depositories in other Cities, and a numerous Corps of Colporteurs, occupied in Distributing Tracts to our Soldiers in the Army and in the Hospitals.

Organised July 18, 1861, the Society has, from that time to the present, been supplying each Army of the Confederacy with religious reading. About Thirty Millions of pages of Tracts have been distributed amongst our brave soldiers. The seed has not been sown in vain. Numerous letters from Chaplains, Officers, and Privates testify to the great good which has been accomplished, and show that the Society has been instrumental, to a considerable extent, in producing and sustaining the wonderful Revival with which God is now blessing our armies.

'THE ARMY AND NAVY MESSENGER,'

the Society's organ, is the most popular paper in the Army. It has been recommended by General Lee, and by many other eminent Officers, who have contributed to its support. It is, preeminently, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Paper, especially designed to interest and profit them, amongst whom it is gratuitously distributed.

When it is considered that the choicest portion of the country is found in the Army, which will, of necessity, give character to the Confederacy, and control its destiny for years to come, the importance of sustaining this Institution, which seeks to consecrate to CHRIST this mighty influence, cannot be over-estimated.

The expenditure of means it involves is very great, and we respectfully solicit donations for the Society and for the Messenger, from all, everywhere, who have at heart the religious welfare of our Soldiers, and the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please send your Contributions to Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, & Co. Liverpool, who will forward them to MANIFESTO OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS DECLARING THE DISPOSITION OF PRINCIPLES AND PURPOSES OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES IN RELATION TO THE EXISTING WAR WITH THE UNITED STATES.*

Whereas: It is due to the great cause of humanity and civilisation, and especially to the heroic sacrifices of their gallant army in the field, that no means, consistent with a proper self-respect and the approved usages of nations, should be omitted by the Confederate States to enlighten the public opinion of the world with regard to the true character of the struggle in which they are engaged, and the dispositions, principles, and purposes by which they are actuated; therefore,

Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America: That the following manifesto be issued in their name, and by their authority, and that the President be requested to cause copies thereof to be transmitted to our commissioners abroad, to the end that the same may be laid before foreign governments.

Manifesto of the Congress of the Confederate States of America relative to the existing war with the United States.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America, acknowledging their responsibility to the opinion of the civilised world, to the great law of Christian philanthropy, and to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, for the part they have been compelled to bear in the sad spectacle of war and carnage which this continent has, for the last three years, exhibited to the eyes of afflicted humanity, deem the present a fitting occasion to declare the principles, the sentiments, and the purposes by which they have been, and are still, actuated.

They have ever deeply deplored the necessity which constrained them to take up arms in defence of their rights, and of the free institutions derived from their ancestors; and there is nothing they more ardently desire than peace, whensoever their enemy, by ceasing from the unhallowed war waged upon them, shall permit them to enjoy in peace the sheltering protection of those hereditary rights and those cherished institutions. The series of successes with which it has pleased Almighty God in so signal a manner to bless our arms on almost every point of our invaded border since the opening of the present campaign, enables us to profess this desire of peace in the interest of civilisation and humanity, without danger of having our motives misinterpreted, of the declaration being ascribed to any unmanly sentiment or any mistrust of our ability fully to maintain our cause. The repeated and disastrous checks, foreshadowing ultimate discomfiture, which their gigantic army, erected against the capital of the Confederacy, has already met with, are but a continuation of the same providential successes for us. We do not recur to these successes in any spirit of vain boasting, but in humble acknowledgment of that Almighty protection which has vouchsafed and granted them.

The world must now see that eight millions of people, inhabiting so extensive a territory, with such varied resources and such numerous facilities for defence as the benignant bounty of nature has bestowed upon us, and animated with one spirit to encounter every sacrifice of ease, of health, of property, of life itself, rather than be degraded from the condition of free and independent States, into which they were born, can never be conquered. Will not our adversaries themselves begin to feel that humanity has bled long enough; that tears and blood and treasure enough have been expended in a bootless undertaking, covering their own land, no less than ours, with a pall of mourning, and exposing them far more than ourselves to the catastrophe of financial exhaustion and bankruptcy, not to speak of the loss of their liberties by the despotism engendered in an aggressive warfare upon the liberties of another and kindred people? Will they be willing, by a longer perseverance in a wanton and hopeless contest, to make this continent, which they so long boasted to be the chosen abode of liberty and self-government, of peace and a higher civilisation, the theatre of the most causeless and prodigal effusion of blood which the world has ever seen, of a virtual relapse into the barbarism of the ruder ages, and of the destruction of constitutional freedom by the lawlessness of usurped power?

These are questions which our adversaries will decide for themselves. We desire to stand acquitted before the tribunal of the world, as well as in the eyes of omniscient justice, of any responsibility for the origin or prolongation of a war as contrary to the spirit of the age as to the traditions and acknowledged principles of the political system of America.

On this continent, whatever opinions may have prevailed elsewhere, it has ever been held and acknowledged by all parties, that government, to be lawful, must be founded on the consent of the governed. We were forced to dissolve our Federal connection with our former associates by their aggressions on the fundamental principles of our compact of union with them; and in doing so we exercised a right consecrated in the great charter of American liberty—the right of a free people, when a Government proves destructive of the ends for which it was established, to recur to the original principles, and to institute new guards for their security. The separate independence of the States, as the sovereign and coequal members of the Federal Union, had never been surrendered, and the pretensions of applying to independent communities, so constituted and organised, the ordinary rules for coercing and reducing rebellious subjects to obedience was a solecism in terms, as well as an outrage on the principles of public law.

The war made upon the Confederate States was, therefore, wholly one of aggression. On our side it has been strictly defensive. Born freemen and the descendants of a gallant ancestry, we had no option but to stand up in defence of our invaded firesides, of our desecrated altars, of our violated liberties and birthright, and of the prescriptive institutions which guard and protect them. We have not interfered, nor do we wish in any manner whatever, to interfere with the internal peace and prosperity of the States arrayed in hostility against us, or with the freest developement of their destinies in any form of action or line of policy they may think proper to adopt for themselves. All we ask is a like immunity for ourselves, and to be left to ourselves in the undisturbed enjoyment of those inalienable rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,' which our common ancestors declared to be the equal heritage of all the parties to the social compact.

Let them forbear aggressions upon us, and the war is at an end. If there be questions which require adjustment by negotiations, we have ever been willing, and are still willing, to enter into communication with our adversaries in a spirit of peace, of equity, and of manly frankness. Strong in the persuasion of the justice of our cause, in the manly devotion of our citizen soldiers, and of the whole body of our people, and above all in the gracious protection of Heaven, we are not afraid to avow a sincere desire for peace on terms consistent with our honour and the permanent security of our rights, and an earnest aspiration to see the world once more restored to the beneficent pursuits of industry and of mutual intercourse and exchanges so essential to its well-being, and which have been so gravely interrupted by the existence of this unnatural war in America.

But if our adversaries, or those whom they have placed in power, deaf to the voice of reason and justice—steeled to the dictates of prudence and humanity by a presumptuous and delusive confidence in their own numbers, or those of their black and foreign mercenaries, shall determine upon an indefinite prolongation of the contest, upon them be the responsibility of a decision so ruinous to themselves and so injurious to the interest and repose of mankind.

For ourselves, we have no fear of the result. The wildest picture ever drawn by a disordered imagination comes short of the extravagance which would dream of the conquest of eight millions of people, resolved with one mind 'to die freemen rather than live slaves,' and forewarned by the savage and exterminating spirit in which this war has been waged upon them, and by the mad avowals of the supporters of the worse than Egyptian bondage that awaits them in the event of their subjugation. With these declarations of our dispositions, our principles and our purposes, we commit our cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflections of our adversaries themselves, and to the solemn and righteous arbitrament of heaven.

* The above Manifesto, in the form of joint resolutions by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Confederate States, was introduced by Mr. Hill of Georgia into the Senate, and passed the House of Representatives, after a secret debate of several hours, on June 10, with a few but unessential modifications. The official copy may, therefore, differ slightly from the Senate copy here given.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

We have dates from New York to the 2nd of July, but there is a singular dearth of intelligence. Up to June 29 the military news referred rather to past than to passing events. It was ascertained that the reverse sustained by General Grant's army on June 22 was of so serious a character that it compelled the Federals to abandon the attempt to cut the line running south of Petersburg, and to fall back to their entrenchments before that place. The Confederates immediately assumed the offensive, and made several attacks on weaker portions of the Federal lines. On the 24th Sheridan commenced crossing the James River near City Point, and lost upwards of 1,000 men from an attack made by the Confederates, and on the 27th a portion of his command was still on the north of the river. General Hunter was retreating to Western Virginia, pursued by the Confederates, who had captured thirteen of his cannon, besides inflicting on him a heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Mr. Stanton reported that the expedition had been successful in destroying railroads; but it was well known in New York that the damage was of small extent, and was repaired in a few hours by a corps specially organised for the purpose.

The news from Sherman was not more encouraging to the Federals. Sherman admits that he made an unsuccessful assault upon the Confederate position at the Kenesaw Mountain on the 27th, and that he lost 3,000 men, including General Harker and four colonels. The Confederates estimate Sherman's loss at 4,500; and it is supposed that Sherman's entire loss does not fall short of 20,000 men. General Pillow was operating on Sherman's rear. The effect of the intelligence from Virginia and the South-west was to send gold up to 250, and to induce the House of Representatives to consent to a compulsory draft, though a few days previously they had refused to repeal the $300 commutation clause by a large majority.

Since the 29th the only news that has transpired is that on the 27th there was a severe cavalry fight at Beam's Station, on the Weldon and Petersburg Railroad. The attempted advance of the Federals was checked, and the position of the expedition was so critical that General Meade sent the 6th corps, with a division of the 2nd corps, to its assistance.

Grant's army is suffering from the sickness incident to the locality in which it is now stationed. Federal despatches say that 5,000 sick and wounded are in hospital at City Point, and that they suffer much from the heat and the lack of good water.

The resignation of Mr. Chase is only important because it indicates that Mr. Lincoln and his immediate supporters are divided amongst themselves, and are conscious that a time of difficulty is at hand. When the ship refuses to obey her helm and is at the mercy of the wind and the waves, a child is as useful at the wheel as a man, and just now it matters not who is United States Secretary of the Treasury. Incapacity can hardly hasten the financial collapse, and the most consummate ability, even if it could for a little while postpone it, could not possibly avert the final crash. If Mr. Chase had retired several months ago, when the premium on gold had been considerably reduced, no one would have been surprised. He would have enjoyed the credit, at least amongst his own party, of successful financial management, and when affairs became desperate the catastrophe would have been charged to the loss of his services. But resignation now, whatever excuse may be put forward, is a confession of failure that will damage Mr. Chase's reputation even with his own political friends. It is not to be wondered at that Mr. Todd, of Ohio, should decline the appointment, and that Senator Fessenden, of Maine, should plead ill health and hesitate a long time before he assented to the wish of the President. Mr. Chase bequeaths to his successor an expenditure wonderfully augmented, and the means of meeting it heavily mortgaged. Mr. Chase was perfectly aware that his game was up in Europe—that his dupes in Germany would soon discover their error, and refuse to part with any more of their hard-earned gold in exchange for greenbacks or for securities of no greater value. We should fancy that even the Republican party must think it a little shabby for Mr. Chase to retire under such circumstances, even though he had a dispute with the President about the patronage of the Treasury. Mr. Chase may be prudent in retiring, but such a proceeding smacks strongly of the instinct of the rat which forsakes the sinking ship.

Many are the signs that the Western States are not well pleased with the Government of Mr. Lincoln, and that they are tired of a war waged against their best customers to oblige the manufacturing New England States, whose interests are inimical to the interests of the agricultural West. The progress of Western discontent has been marked and rapid. Last autumn Mr. Vallandigham was banished for a mild protest against the policy of the Federal Government. He has now returned to Ohio, and dares the Government to arrest him. Mr. Lincoln is told that it will require 50,000 troops to preserve order in the State if Mr. Vallandigham is arrested; and so the Government has been obliged to confess its weakness by permitting a man banished as 'a traitor' to successfully defy its authority. Western representatives were the first to talk of peace and recognition in the Halls of Congress; and seeing that the Northern gaols are full of political offenders whose utterances were never a hundredth part so treasonable, we may be sure that Mr. Long and Mr. Voorhees would not have escaped the vengeance of the Administration and its Congressional supporters had it not been felt that the 'Great West' supported them. Throughout the spring, in spite of a most rigid censorship of the press, sufficient transpired to inform Europe that the West was divided into hostile camps, that in some quarters rioting was chronic, and that it would require the aid of a large army to enforce a Federal draft or to collect Federal taxes. Scarcely a week passes by without some fresh evidence of the growth of Western discontent. We have at this moment before us two noteworthy documents. The one is a letter from General G. W. Morgan, of Ohio, published in the Mount Vernon (Ohio) Banner, in which, as one of the delegates to the Chicago Convention, he explains his views respecting the war. No matter what the result of the campaign in Virginia, he advocates an immediate armistice of sixty days. Still more significant is a letter, the text of which we give elsewhere, written and published by Colonel Anderson, in which he refuses to act as delegate at the Chicago Convention, and not only protests against the continuance of the war, but denounces the selfishness of New England in unmeasured terms, and is bold enough to speak of a Western Confederacy. Thus, even if the North can carry on the present war, it cannot do so with impunity. For the sake of empire it has sacrificed property and liberty, and if it continue the vain attempt to conquer the South it will lose instead of gain territory. We do not say that the West is about to secede, but no one can imagine that the West is to be permanently joined to the East, and it is impossible to reject the mass of evidence which shows that every day of war with the South hastens the era of Western secession.

Mr. Lincoln has formally accepted the nomination of the Baltimore Convention. He writes: 'The nomination is gratefully accepted, as the resolutions of the Convention—called the Platform—are heartily approved.' Respecting the Monroe resolution, Mr. Lincoln writes as follows:—

> While the resolution in regard to the supplanting of republican government upon the Western Continent is fully concurred in, there might be misunderstanding were I not to say that the position of the Government in relation to the action of France in Mexico as assumed through the State Department and indorsed by the Convention among the measures and acts of the Executive, will be faithfully maintained so long as the state of facts shall leave that position pertinent and applicable.

By this Mr. Lincoln informs his supporters that he agrees with them in denouncing the establishment of the Empire of Mexico, and the inference is that he will at the opportune moment vindicate the Monroe doctrine. It is likely that the more ardent of his party will chafe at this delay, but they will probably feel some confidence in Mr. Lincoln's sincerity from the reflection that whilst doing what they could to conciliate the Government of France, Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet and his officers have been indefatigable in their efforts to foment the ill-will of the people against the Empire of Mexico. Mr. Lincoln evidently thinks it is an easy task to hoodwink the Government of France.

The Governor of New York is now manifesting an intention of opposing the arbitrary proceedings of the Federal Government. He has addressed a letter to the District Attorney, in which he says that as the Grand Jury, in disregard of their oaths, have refused to examine into the circumstances connected with the suppression of the World and Journal of Commerce, the case must be brought before some proper magistrate, and that any requisite assistance will be given to the District Attorney in carrying on the prosecution. We elsewhere publish this letter.

In the case of an idiot boy named Garvin, who was sold into the military service by a bounty broker, Governor Seymour has instructed the District Attorney of the County to 'make a thorough investigation of the case of Cornelius Garvin, sold as a substitute into the Fifty-second New York Volunteers, and, if possible, bring the guilty parties to justice.'

The following is the resolution submitted to the Federal House of Representatives in regard to the right of Congress to have a voice in negotiations with Foreign Powers:—

Resolved: That Congress has the constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy, not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force, when authorised by law, and the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition, while pending and undetermined, is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power.

Mr. Fernando Wood lately delivered a speech in favour of peace in the Federal House of Representatives. On being charged with assisting in the organisation of the Mozart regiment in the beginning of the war, he replied that he did so for the defence of Washington and not for the purpose of waging war against the South; and, upon a member observing that the Mozart regiment was intended for service in the South, Mr. Wood said: 'If it is true that I raised so many men for such deeds of blood, may Almighty God forgive me for the sin and crime!' This remark was loudly hissed by the Republican members.

The commutation clause was repealed by the Federal House of Representatives on June 28. A few days before it had rejected the proposition by a majority of nearly two to one. The Government notified that the war could not be carried on without more men, that volunteering was exhausted, and that the draft was useless so long as exemption could be obtained by the payment of $300. On this the Republican members banded together and struck out the clause from the Conscription Act. It remains to be seen whether the Federal Government has the power to enforce an actual draft.

Mr. Thurlow Weed's charges against the Republican party have caused a profound sensation. We presume there is no good defence to be made to them, or it would have been offered instead of mere recrimination. Mr. Horace Greely writes a letter in which he says that he and Mr. Weed were formerly associates, and adds: 'We have since separated, simply and only because one of us has come to believe in and practise systematically using legislators and legislation to advance personal interests and promote private ends. Whatever may be asserted, there is not, there never was, another serious ground of difference between us. The City Railroad Bills of 1860, the Whisky legislation of the present session, illustrate the whole matter.' To this Mr. Weed rejoins in what the New York papers call a 'scorching letter,' in which he repudiates the charges brought against himself, and prefers further charges of Republican corruption. On the testimony of the Republican party, the Government which it creates and supports is utterly corrupt and demoralised.

On June 27, it was proposed to the Federal Senate by Mr. Trumbull to repeal the joint resolution of Congress restricting the forfeiture of Southern property to lifetime. In reply to Mr. McDougal, Mr. Trumbull said, 'his action was on the same principle on which he reconciled the killing of rebels. If we had a right to take their lives, we had a right to take their property. How could such a war as this be carried on by jury trials?' In reply to Mr. Cowan, he advocated perpetual confiscation, and said, 'The war meant destruction, desolation, and death, and, he would almost say, damnation.' The Senate adjourned without coming to any decision.

The Federal Senate has decided that Messrs. Fishback and Baxter, who were elected by Mr. Lincoln's agents as Senators for Arkansas, are not entitled to seats. The Committee reported that 'there was no evidence that the rebellion had been suppressed, a portion of Arkansas being still under the control of the insurgents.' This is antagonistic to Mr. Lincoln's reconstruction scheme for the manufacture of Presidential votes.

Though General John Pope could not make a military reputation in Virginia, it appears that he is making some money in Minnesota. A New York paper says: 'The Sioux massacres are beginning again in the north-west. General Pope is still in charge of that department, with his head-quarters at Milwaukie, where he concerns himself much more to improve his fortunes than to repair his tattered military reputation. The sort of horses which he has supplied some portions of his command with would disgrace the yard of condemned horses at Washington. They come about as near to the requirements of the service as his war-bulletins from the south-west, and from Virginia during his disastrous defeats there two summers ago, came to the truth.'

On June 27 the Federal Senate agreed to print 3,000 extra copies of the report of the commission to enquire into the condition of the freed negroes. In the course of the discussion Mr. Saulsbury said 'he once read a book written by Robert Dale Owen, the author of this document. Everybody who had bought the book had been cheated out of the purchase-money. Such a conglomeration of infidelity and nonsense was never before published. The man who would write such a book as that was not capable of writing anything worthy of being printed by the Senate.'

Two petitions have been presented to the Federal Senate for a change in the preamble of the Constitution. This is an indirect admission on the part of the 'loyal citizens' that the North has no constitutional right to coerce the seceding States. It never seems to occur to those who are so anxious to amend the Constitution, that a compact which can be so radically changed must necessarily, under certain conditions, leave the parties to it a legal right to declare it at an end.

The New York Herald has ceased to announce the immediate capture of Richmond, and intimates that that event is not likely to take place this season. It does not blame General Grant for the failure, but asserts that Mr. Lincoln is alone responsible for it. The Herald says that Grant has not been properly supported, and that Butler, Sigel, and Hunter were forced upon him as division generals against his better judgment. These charges against Mr. Lincoln are unfounded. Grant has been lavishly supplied with men, and had the supreme direction of the campaign and a free choice of officers.

On June 27 the Federal House of Representatives discussed a resolution proposed by Mr. Ingersoll, declaring 'as their opinion, that all permits heretofore issued by the Treasury Department, allowing persons to trade within the limits of any States heretofore or now in rebellion, should at once be revoked and no more be issued.' On the motion of Mr. Washburne, the consideration of it was postponed for ten days, which, the report of the Congressional proceedings says, was equivalent to postponing it beyond the present session of Congress. It will thus be seen that the Yankee love for the dollar is stronger than his hate for what he is pleased to call a rebellion.

The New York money market is very much agitated, and the fluctuations in the price of gold have been extraordinary. Towards the end of the month gold was quoted at about 240. On July 1 it opened at 250, and rose to 282. It declined to 260 on the news that Mr. Fessenden's appointment had been confirmed, and it fell to 230 on the repeal of the Gold Bill by the Senate. Next day it began creeping up, and in the evening was quoted at 234.

CANADA.

There seems to be some hope of Canada emerging from the normal state of Ministerial crises and Governmental dead-locks in which it has existed for the past three years. Our readers are aware that the representatives of Upper Canada are equal in number to those of Lower Canada; and that inasmuch as the races, languages, systems of religious belief, and sets of laws in the two divisions are different from and opposite to each other, the Legislative Assembly has been divided sectionally. Neither party can rule, though each can defeat the other. Now Mr. Brown, as leader of the Opposition, has come to a compromise with Messrs. Cartier, J. A. Macdonald, and Galt; and the basis thereof can best be given in the language in which it was announced to the Assembly:—'The Government are prepared to pledge themselves to bring in a measure next session for the purpose of removing existing difficulties by introducing the Federal principle into Canada, coupled with such provisions as will permit the maritime provinces and the north-west territory to be incorporated into the same system of government; and the Government will seek, by sending representatives to the lower provinces and to England, to secure the assent of those interests which are beyond the control of our own Legislature to such a measure as will enable all British North America to be united under a general Legislature based upon the Federal principle.'

We learn by a telegram from New York dated June 29, that a frightful accident had occurred on the Grand Trunk Railway. An emigrant train ran off the Beleeil Bridge, near St. Hilaire, Canada East. Thirty-four dead and 350 wounded had been taken from the wreck.

ENGLAND.

At a meeting held at the London Tavern to consider the measures necessary for the relief of the Circassian exiles, Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, after a sketch of the events associated in the course of history with the land of the Caucasus, proceeded to consider the position of the unhappy people who inhabited those regions. He said that Russia had no ground of complaint against the Circassians, except that they occasionally crossed the border on predatory incursions: even this charge could not be laid to the mountaineers, for it was only the people of the plains bordering the river Khuban who were guilty of those acts. He was anxious to avoid mixing up the benevolent question before them with the political subject between Russia and Circassia: at the same time he thought that they would be traitors to the great cause of humanity if they did not avail themselves of all opportunities of that kind to mark their reprobation of the conduct of Russia, and to do their utmost to relieve those who were the victims of the tyranny and oppression of strong but unscrupulous neighbours. The Turkish Government had displayed the most laudable spirit of hospitality, and the Sultan himself had contributed a large sum for their relief, but the Turkish Treasury was insufficient to meet the demand made upon it. The number of emigrants was over 300,000, and to provide for them until their absorption into Turkish society or the Turkish army, would involve an outlay of some five millions sterling. The Marquis of Clanricarde, who was present, said that the British Government had sent from the public stores 600 tons of biscuit for their relief. Lord Shaftesbury, in the course of a speech, said that, in the darkest periods of the world's history, a time was never known when such scenes of atrocity and crime, such disregard of right and principle existed, as were now to be witnessed. The meeting finally agreed to resolutions embodying a general appeal to the generosity of the British public for aid in the relief of the exiles.

If a man fancies that the English soldier can do nothing but fight, he has only to go to Aldershot camp and see the Exhibition of Works of Industry. Every article displayed in the Club House is the handiwork of the officers and privates, and of the officers' and privates' wives and children belonging to regiments in the camp. The work of the officers is good, but that that of the privates is miraculous. The former are successful, as might reasonably be expected, in water-colours, crayons, photographs, lace, and fine work, with the addition of some exquisite wood-carving and water-colours by Hon. H. H. Clifford, V.C., a collection of ivory-turnings by Lieutenant Wilkinson, and a model steam-engine by Captain Batt. But the privates astonish the eye of the visitor with quilts of cloth done in patchwork by their own hands, and with the woven and knitted wool counterpanes for which the English soldier has a traditionary taste. There also may be seen mahogany furniture, both plain and polished, the work of Dragoons; there, too, water-colours and photographs, the work of Hussars. Artillerymen take pride in model harness, model batteries, miniature Armstrong guns. Royal Engineers send drawings, models, and maps of surpassing accuracy, even baths and marble fonts. Other corps show stuffed birds, rest and stand for photographic camera, inlaid work, crayons, wood-carving; while one private turns out a complete set of drawing-room and bed-room furniture, with portable camp-bed and mattress; and a sergeant presents specimens of electro-plating. The War Office, too, gets many a practical hint, for a private teaches a method of making lint with miraculous rapidity, and a corporal improves immensely on the regulation cartridge-pouch. In addition to the efforts of handicraft, there is a show of beautiful articles lent by the officers and men. Among these are a few relics of the heights of the Alma and the plain of Inkerman; but the spoils of the East more plainly show that here in England we may say—

Captivum portatur ebur, captiva Corinthus.

Dresses that once adorned the proudest of Mandarins, vases, bronzes, tulwars, shields, and other trophies, give ocular demonstration that the English soldier has within the last few years stormed Lucknow and Delhi, sacked the summer palace of the Emperor of China, and spoiled the Daimios of Japan.

THE annual meeting of the National Rifle Association at Wimbledon commenced this week. Immense exertions have been made to meet the wants of the competitors and visitors, and to organise the shooting. No less than eighty-one targets have been erected, and so great is the space of ground occupied by the ranges that it has been found necessary to construct a tramway to carry the riflemen from point to point. The value of the prizes offered is 5,500*l.*, irrespective of such gifts as the Elcho Shield. About 1,000 men have gone under canvass for the fortnight. Additional rewards have been offered for proficiency in the use of the regulation Enfield. The review will take place on Saturday, July 23. We shall give hereafter some account of the principal matches, with their results.

THE Chapel Royal of the Savoy, situated on the south side of the Strand and west of Wellington-street, an object of study to the antiquary, of admiration to the lover of art, and of affection to the people of the parish, has been destroyed by fire. Nothing remains but the bare walls, and a small part of the monuments. It was the last remnant of the ancient Palace of the Savoy, within the precincts of which it stood. The chapel was built in the early part of the reign of Henry VIII. It was in the Gothic style and was ninety feet long by twenty-four wide. The ceiling was of oak and pear tree, divided into 138 quatrefoil panels, each adorned with carving. A portion of the panels represented the passion and death of the Saviour, and the remainder contained the emblems of the alliances of the House of Lancaster. Among the most striking of the monuments were those of Sir Robert Douglas and his lady, erected in the seventeenth century; of Jocosa, daughter of Sir Adam Apsley, and wife of the Earl of Dalhousie; and of Arabella, Countess of Nottingham. There was also a tablet to the memory of Ann Killigrew, the lady whom Dryden spoke of as 'a Grace for beauty and a Muse for wit.' There was a splendid altar-piece and a beautiful window bearing the inscription, 'This window was glazed at the cost of the congregation in honour of God and in gratitude to our Queen Victoria.' The window had been placed there in 1843, after the restoration of the interior of the chapel by Her Majesty. The benefice is in the gift of the Queen in right of the Duchy of Lancaster. In this chapel was held the conference between the Episcopalian and Presbyterian divines in 1661, and it is said that here first the Liturgy in the vernacular was heard after its restoration by Queen Elizabeth. The fabric was insured to the amount of four thousand pounds, and the Queen has intimated her intention of defraying the additional cost of the restoration.

THE Prince of Wales has been presented with the freedom of the ancient guild of clothworkers, and has taken the oath of the corporation. The honourable company entertained their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at luncheon after the ceremony of admission.

MR. TENNYSON will shortly publish a new volume of poems, of about the same size as 'In Memoriam.' The Poet Laureate has chosen for this work the title of 'Enoch Arden.'

THE Great Eastern has left the port of Liverpool for Sheerness, where she will ship the Atlantic cable.

LORD'S cricket ground was thronged on Friday and Saturday last with thousands of people, assembled to witness the match between the rival schools of Eton and Harrow. It seemed as though Ascot had transplanted itself to the territory of the Marylebone Club, so great was the number of well-dressed ladies and fashionable men. The carriages, too, stood in ranks four deep round the ground. The ladies wore bonnets of that shade of blue which they favoured, or heralded their sympathy by the trimmings of their dresses and parasols. The heads of the horses and the whips of the drivers were adorned in like manner. The champions of Harrow having won the toss, went first to the wickets, and obtained the large score of 242 runs, Mr. Buller adding 61, and Mr Stow adding 54 runs to the score. The Eton boys, in their first innings, made only 63 runs, and consequently, according to a well known rule, followed their innings. In the second attempt the Eton boys made 113 runs, of which 50 were put to the credit of the Hon. S. G. Lyttelton. The result, therefore, was, that Harrow defeated Eton in one innings, with 66 runs to spare. At the conclusion of the game a match was commenced between an eleven of the Marylebone Club and the united forces of Eton and Harrow. The schoolboys obtained 152 runs in their first innings, while their opponents made only 87. The state of the score furnished a pleasing commentary on the uncertainty of the game. On behalf of the united schools five Eton and six Harrow boys went to the wickets. The five Eton boys got 91 runs—the six Harrow boys got 46 runs; thus entirely reversing the result of the match between the schools.

THE interest of the July Meeting at Newmarket was entirely confined to two races, and to two horses in those races. Nothing can be more beneficial to the wearied mind and the wearied body than a few days in the summer weather of July spent on Newmarket Heath, where the most bracing air may be inhaled and the sport witnessed without crowd, noise, or bustle. So even where the racing is deficient in quality and quantity, the time spent on the noble heath is not lost. The July Stakes and the Chesterfield Stakes were rendered highly attractive by the anticipated meeting of two colts of great reputation. The first of these was Liddington, by Orlando, out of Lady Roden, by West Australian, who won two important races at the Ascot meeting, and has never been defeated. The other was a colt called The Duke, by Stockwell, out of Bay Celia, who, on the strength of an excellent performance at Stockbridge some weeks before, was held to be good enough to dispute the palm of supremacy with Liddington. Three other horses came to the post for the July Stakes—namely, the Duc de Morny's Lelio; Mr. Naylor's Skirter, by Skirmisher, out out of Manganese; and the Duke of Beaufort's Todleben, by Muscovite, out of Palm. Lelio is a somewhat remarkable horse. He is a son of West Australian and Launcelot, and was bred in France. His shape and action do credit to his breed, and he only needs care and fortune to achieve success. He was sufficiently fat at Newmarket to justify the opinion that he was merely out on a visit of inspection. Those who are curious about such matters may be interested to learn that Lelio has never been shod, and that the practice of trusting to the natural hardness of the hoof has found favour with trainer of the Duc de Morny's stud. Lelio is only engaged in the Doncaster St. Leger of 1865, for which he may possibly become a formidable competitor. The July Stakes is by subscription of 50*l.* each, with 30*l.* forfeit, for two-year-old colts and fillies, at the respective weights of 122 lbs. and 119 lbs., the length of the course being about five and a half furlongs. The betting was even on Mr. Merry's 'crack,' Liddington, while 11 to 8 was laid against the Marquis of Hastings' The Duke, and 10 to 1 against Lelio. The race was a strange one, and has given rise to a thousand surmises and numerous controversies. At about three hundred yards from the winning post, Liddington and The Duke singled themselves out, and while The Duke seemed to be going entirely at his ease, the rider of Liddington was hard upon his horse with whip and spur. The Duke's jockey seemed to sit perfectly still, and Liddington, struggling gamely to the end, won, to the utter amazement of the spectators, by a neck. Loud were the complaints against Judd, the rider of The Duke. It was said that he mistook the winning post, or did not see it at all, and that another proof was afforded of the folly of allowing a mere stable lad to ride instead of an experienced jockey. The friends of Lord Hastings and the followers of the redoubtable John Day looked unutterable things at the defeat of the champion of Stockbridge. However, they consoled themselves with the certainty of a revenge on the ensuing Thursday, when the rival horses were once more to meet. Thursday came, and the two horses appeared at the post for the Chesterfield Stakes, a race somewhat similar in conditions to the July Stakes, except that the distance is only half a mile, and that Liddington and The Duke each carried 7 lb. extra as a penalty for ancient victories. The latter fact did not, however, deter the ring from placing every confidence in the two 'cracks,' and despising the seven other animals who started. Fordham, whose riding the multitude never tires of praising, but who, like other mortals, has been known to err magnificently, was put up on The Duke in the place of the much abused Judd, and once more the money of the Duke of Beaufort, the Marquis of Hastings, and the other patrons of Stockbridge, seemed to be heaped on The Duke; for now Fordham was up, and this time there could be no mistake. Directly that the flag of the starter fell, Liddington cut out the work with the terrific speed of a true son of Orlando, and quickly made the pace too hot for The Duke. At the distance The Duke was vainly struggling to get up to his opponent, who came away in the most gallant style and won in a canter by three lengths. We forbear to decide whether, after such a performance, the defeat of The Duke on the first day was the fault of his rider. We merely remark that Judd got within a neck of Liddington, and that Fordham was left hopelessly in the rear. After the race the gallant Liddington was backed for the Derby of 1865 at the short odds of 7 to 1. No one can doubt the speed of the horse, but stoutness is a matter of grave question when the sire Orlando.

IN the way of mobs there is perhaps nothing like those which England can produce. Let the common herd of a good size town be got together, and let some slight disappointment vex them, and their ferocity will prove that they are the direst acts of a violent and angry race, unrestrained by the teaching of modern civilisation. An ordinary visitor to Leicester would say, in its plain but well built houses and its laborious population, the signs of peace and industry. If he enquired he would learn that crime is rare, that wages are good and work plentiful, yet Leicester can do battle and disgrace itself as to which the brutal element of the Saxon race is evoked. The brave and successful aeronaut, Mr Henry Coxwell, had been engaged to make an ascent in his balloon at the fête of the Foresters. The race-course at Leicester was the spot where he was to ascend, and the hour fixed was 5.30 P.M. Many adventurous persons had taken tickets for seats in the car, and a multitude of 20,000 people had assembled to witness the start. It seems almost incredible, but yet it is a fact, that not more than half a dozen police were present, while no proper barriers had been erected or other means adopted to keep off the crowd. What protection was afforded to Mr Coxwell was done very early in the afternoon, and while the party which was about to ascend had to fight their way through the mob to the car, four or five policemen vainly struggled by force or entreaty to keep one space clear for the necessary arrangements. Not to make the story a long one, it is enough to say that reports were spread that Mr Coxwell had only brought an old and small ball on, that he did not intend to ascend, that the whole affair was a fraud. The mob charged, broke the netting, and damaged the car. At length Mr. Coxwell to avoid danger let go the guy. In a moment a rush was made to the ball on, and the beautiful fabric was demolished. The police rallied round Mr. Coxwell, who was carried off, and [illegible] shouts of murderous intent, with the loss of his coat and hat, and some personal injury. The balloon was set on fire, and that portion which the flames did not consume was carried in triumph through Leicester. Such was the conduct of a multitude of people on a fête-day, in a thriving town in the heart of England.

A RESPECTABLE woman of about twenty years of age got into a train at the Waterloo Station, of the South-Western Railway, in the afternoon of July 6. A man named Henry Nash, a yeoman of middle age, followed her into the carriage. Another woman travelled with them to Surbiton, and there alighted. Immediately afterwards Nash endeavourged to engage the young woman in conversation. Annoyed by his importunities she went to the window, and stood looking out of it. Nash followed her, and from words proceeded to acts, laying his hands on her, and otherwise insulting her. She opened the door of the carriage, got outside, and stood on the step holding by the handle of the door. The train was going at the rate of forty miles an hour: a man in the next carriage caught sight of her, and, leaning as far as possible out of the window, threw his arm round her waist. She at once swooned, and was held by the strength of the friendly arm for the distance of about five miles. The guard's attention was drawn by the gesticulations of the people in the fields, who saw the state of affairs, and the train was stopped. The woman was rescued from her perilous position, and the man Nash given into the custody of the police.

A GENTLEMAN named Briggs, chief clerk in the banking-house of Robarts & Co. of Lombard Street, a fine, tall, and powerful man, about sixty years of age, left the Bank at three o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday last, went to Peckham, dined there with his niece, remained till 8.30 p.m., thence proceeded in an omnibus to the city, reached the railway station in Fenchurch Street at twenty minutes to ten, and entered the train on the North London Railway, intending to go to Hackney Wick Station, near which he resided. He wore a gold watch, with albert chain, a gold eye-glass, and a diamond ring. He had with him a leather bag, such as is generally used by bankers' clerks in removing bullion, and a walking-stick, 4*l.* 10*s.* in his pocket, with a pocket-book and a silver snuff-box. The train stopped at Bow Station, and again at Hackney. At the latter station some person opened the door of one of the carriages, and found the cushions, the floor, sides, windows, and door handle smeared with blood. In the carriage were found a hat, a walking-stick, and a leathern bag. At the same time, some ladies in the adjoining compartment informed the guard that some blood had been spurted through the carriage window on to their dresses as the train came from Bow. This discovery was made about twenty minutes past ten. About the same time, the driver and stoker of another train working in the opposite direction from Hackney to Bow, saw something lying in the six-foot way. They stopped the train, and the stoker going back, found the body of a gentleman saturated with blood, and apparently dead. He went to a public-house hard by, got assistance, and had the body removed thither. Surgeons were sent for, and it was found that the injured man was not dead, though frightfully knocked about and quite insensible. On the arrival of the police the clothes were examined, and the letters in the pocket-book were found to be addressed to 'T. Briggs, Esq., Messrs. Robarts', Curtis, & Co.'s, Lombard Street.' A messenger was at once sent to the bank, and the news was thence forwarded to the family of Mr. Briggs at Hackney. His son came, with other members of the family; but the wounded man showed no sign of consciousness, and, having been removed in the morning to his own house, expired at a quarter before twelve on Sunday night. The money, 4*l.* 10*s.*, was found in his pocket, so also were the snuff-box, the ring, and the eye-glass: the watch and chain were gone. The bag was, as already mentioned, found in the carriage, but had been opened, though nothing was obtained from it. The walking-stick was also found in the carriage, and also a hat, which was found not to be the hat of the murdered man. It has in it, however, as far as is yet known, no mark except the maker's name, and inasmuch as the name is that of a firm doing a large business, and the hat an old one, but little assistance can be expected from it. The facts, as far as collected, present a considerable difficulty. The body was clearly thrown out of the carriage between Bow and Hackney, and the place where it was found was somewhat nearer to Bow than to Hackney. The train would run between these stations in about two minutes and a half. Therefore, only about one minute elapsed after the train left Bow and before the body was thrown out. Again, the train stopped at Bow, and the murderer or murderers were, of course, aware of that. Is it conceivable, then, that they assailed their victim before their arrival at Bow and ran the risk of detection there; on the other hand, it was clear that there had been a struggle, and frightful violence used, and it is a question whether all this could have been effected in one minute. The motive for the crime is not clear. If plunder was the object, why was the watch taken and the money left? Or, again, was there a disappointed expectation of money in the leather bag? A preliminary examination has been held before the coroner, and large rewards have been offered for the detection of the guilty parties. Such crimes render a journey by railway a frightful ordeal for timid ladies and nervous gentlemen, and the horror culminates when a start is made with one man for a fellow passenger. The remedy is plain. In England travellers are packed in boxes which hold but six persons, and no communication with the outer world is possible: a million deaths stare the unhappy prisoner in the face while aid is vainly invoked. Other countries might teach us that such risks are unknown when carriages hold, not six, but twenty people, and even on some English railways the comfort and safety of saloon carriages may be experienced. At least there is no difficulty in providing communication between the guard and the passengers. Meanwhile the railway authorities are as guilty of the manslaughter of Mr. Briggs as if the mischief had been caused by a rickety bridge or a rotten axletree.

WE regret to have to announce the death of Lieutenant-Colonel Brewster, who has commanded the famous Volunteer Regiment, 'The Inns of Court Rifles' (familiarly known as 'The Devil's Own'), since the formation of that corps. There is not a man in the regiment who has not equally admired their gallant colonel as an accomplished soldier and a courteous gentleman, and to all it has been made clear that to the exertions of that officer the acknowledged proficiency of the regiment is due. Lieutenant-Colonel Brewster was formerly a Captain in the 60th Rifles, and greatly distinguished himself in the Kaffir war. Lieutenant-Colonel Brewster was buried yesterday with military honours, the regiment following his body to the grave. Many members of the legal profession came up to town from the assizes in order to be present at the ceremony.

INDIA.

The Government of Calcutta is taking measures to punish the Bhootiahs for the insults offered to the envoy, Mr. Ashley Eden.

The tract of land situated at the foot of the Bhootan Hills, called Ambarree Fallacootah, is to be immediately annexed to the British territories. The sum of 10,000 rupees, hitherto paid as a subsidy to the tribes on the frontier of Assam, is to be discontinued. The Bhootiahs are to be hemmed in by posts established along the frontier, and supplies will be stopped between British India and Bhootan.

Sir Hugh Rose will shortly be succeeded in the chief command of the army by Sir William Mansfield.

AFRICA.

News has been received from Khartûm of the safety of the explorer, Mr. Samuel Baker. After the departure of Speke and Grant, Baker had started for the south in search of the lake Luta Nzige. His party was met on its way back to Gendohoro. A swift vessel has been placed at his disposal by Mr. Petherick, and he will at once descend the Nile.

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

The military operations that have taken place during the past week have been of no significance. Events are occurring elsewhere which may do away with the necessity for further bloodshed, and the respective armies have wisely abstained from creating fresh complications. The Austrians have erected batteries on the coast of Jutland opposite to Middelfahrt, in the island of Fünen, with a view to a passage over the straits; the batteries are said to stand on the bare rock, completely exposed to an enemy's fire, thus showing the recklessness of the Germans, or the contempt in which they hold their opponents. On the night of the 5th inst. a party of Austrian Chasseurs took possession of the island of Fohr, on the west coast of Slesvig. General Gerlach, the Commander-in-Chief of the Danish forces, has resigned his office, principally in consequence of the way in which he received the very sound advice given to him by General Caroc. The latter pointed out that the position occupied by the Danish troops in North Jutland was not only untenable, but must inevitably lead to their total loss; he was snubbed for this by his commander, and thereupon resigned his commission. He proceeded to Copenhagen to give an account of the transaction, and the result of his visit was the retirement of General Gerlach, and the appointment of General Steinmann to the chief command. Steamers have been sent round in all haste to embark the Danish troops now in Jutland north of the Limfjord before the enemy succeeds in overpowering them. A sharp encounter took place between a small body of Danes under Colonel Beck and the Austrian troops in possession of Sunboge opposite Aalborg on the Limfjord; the Danes had been deceived as to the number of their enemies, and tried to carry the place with the bayonet, but were repulsed after a gallant attack. On the 10th inst. the Austrian troops commenced crossing the Limfjord in boats near the town of Aalborg; the advance into the north of Jutland began immediately afterwards. The shores of the Sound between Copenhagen and Elsinore are being hastily armed; Cronberg, the fortress immediately commanding the straits, has received a reinforcement and a fresh armament. The Dagbladet calls upon the Government to give up their attempt at a blockade, and to concentrate their navy for the defence of the capital.

The result of the attack made upon the Fordenskiold and the Heckla, mentioned last week, is officially declared by the Danes to be nil. The Prussians announce that five large ships of war appeared in the Aaroe Sund, between Alsen and Slesvig, on the night of the 5th inst., but retired on finding that the shores were strongly occupied.

DENMARK.

The addresses of the Landsthing and Volksthing of Denmark to the King express the satisfaction of the nation at the course which the Government is pursuing; it assures the King of the support of his people so long as they see that the main object of his negotiations is the freedom of the people and independence from Germany.

But the rumour of the day is that the King has in his own person expressed an ardent desire for peace, and taken some decided steps to attain his object. In the first place he has sent his youngest brother, Prince John of Glücksburg, on a mission to Prussia; he arrived at Berlin on the 6th inst., spent a few hours there in very strictest incognito, and then went on to Carlsbad. What the propositions may be of which the Prince is the bearer, whether they concern the grand question of peace, or are only on some matters of detail, is entirely a matter of conjecture; but the idea that the mission is of the gravest possible character is countenanced by the recent political crisis in Denmark. On the 8th inst., by the express desire of the King, all the Ministers sent in their resignations. The King then sent to Count von Moltke-Nutchau, who was formerly a member of the Bluhme Ministry, and requested him to form a new Administration. The Count has up to this time been considered as an ultra-reactionist, and a bitter enemy of the German party and of the independence of the Duchies; but, being less committed to a war policy than Bishop Monrad, it is supposed that he will be better able to make the concessions which the situation requires. Thus the attitude of Denmark has been completely reversed. Last week it declined all further negotiation; now it has sent an envoy to the enemy's capital. Last week it was attempting to wage war by land and sea with its opponents on equal terms; now it is collecting all its military and naval forces for the defence of its own metropolis. Not three weeks are past since it refused to purchase a permanent truce at the price of raising the blockade; now it is inclined to raise it of its own accord. Last week, 'war to the uttermost' was the cry; now, what wonder if men are beginning to murmur 'peace?'

The new Cabinet is—President of the Council and Foreign Secretary, Herr von Bluhme; Minister of the Interior, Herr Tilisch; Minister for War, Lieutenant-General Hansen; Minister for Marine, Councillor Lütken; Minister for Justice and Public Worship, Chamberlain Helzen; Minister of Finance, Councillor David; Minister for Slesvig, Chamberlain Johannsen. Count Moltke-Nutchau and Herr von Quaade are Ministers without portfolios.

GERMANY.

Herr von Beust is about to present to the Federal Diet a report of the Conference of London. It is officially stated that he will accompany his report by three recommendations: the first advocating a prompt solution of the question of succession in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg, the second advising a declaration of war against Denmark, and the third pointing out the necessity for a Federal reform. To English minds the first recommendation is of the most singular character, considering that the Diet are now engaged in the examination of the Duke of Augustenburg's claims; so that Herr von Beust is either insulting them by ordering them to perform an act of simple justice should the Duke's claims be proved to be good, or requesting them to violate their honour and word in favour of his protégé if it appears that the Duke has no right to the succession. The Diet has summoned the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg to substantiate his claims to the Duchy of Holstein, according to his promise. This action of the Diet has been received by many Germans with great bitterness of heart. It is said that the Oldenburg claims are nothing more than a rechauffé of those of Denmark and of Russia, which have already been rejected: and that a reexamination of them is only a cloak for treachery. The Slesvig-Holstein committee of Frankfort in particular has fulminated a proclamation against the Diet, in which it declares that the German nation demands that the German Governments, in accordance with their solemn engagements, should immediately pronounce in favour of the recognition of the Duke of Augustenburg, and put him in a position to assume the reins of Government according to the fundamental law of the Duchies. Oddly enough, it is generally understood that the claims of Oldenburg will find no support in the German cabinets, not because they fail in satisfying this fundamental law so pathetically cited, but because the Duke of Augustenburg is the favourite with the inhabitants of the Duchies.

The correspondence published by our contemporary, the Morning Post, could not fail to elicit some statements from the Governments most interested therein. A formal denial of their authenticity has been given by the Austrian embassy: that of the Prussians was mentioned in our last number. The German newspapers have been both very violent and very guarded on the subject. The Nord-Deutsche Zeitung represents the first feeling; the Presse of Vienna thinks Herr von Bismarck would scarcely have been so 'naif' as to express himself openly on a matter of such delicacy; the Kreuz-Zeitung qualifies the despatches as 'authentic falsehoods,' whatever that may mean; the Volks-Zeitung hopes that the denial of the German cabinets will lay the ghost of a 'Holy Alliance,' with which England is terrified; the Botschafter considers that the despatches put the conduct and views of Austria in a favourable light before Europe, as showing that the project for a Holy Alliance broke down before the enlightened opposition of Austria.

The new Zollverein is now complete by the adhesion of Hanover and Oldenburg to the terms of the Franco-Prussian treaty. Hanover has only held out up to this time, in order to obtain the lion's share of the advantages; and she has been satisfied in her desire.

The trial of 150 Poles accused of various political offences is now proceeding. The scene of the trial is an enormous wooden shed erected for the express purpose in the penitentiary yard of the fortress of Moabit. Of the 150 accused, 23 had time to escape, but 11 of these have since returned into the hands of the police: among the prisoners are some very lofty names; Czartoryski, the son of Prince Adam, who was named for the revolutionary crown of Poland; and Radiswill, one of an eminently patriot family. The dimensions of the trial will be enormous; 400 witnesses will appear, and the whole bar of Berlin, Posen, and the neighbouring universities has been engaged for the defence; the indictments make up a folio volume containing hundreds of pages. The first day of the trial was occupied with the examination of certain requests made by the prisoners: one of them was for interpreters, on the ground that very few of the Poles understood German; this was overruled by the presiding judge, who said he had good reason to know the contrary: another request was that a crucifix might be placed on the table of the court, as a sign both for accused and judges, a fashion which is almost universal in foreign criminal courts. Their request was received, as diplomatists say now-a-days, ad referendum; the minister of justice was to give his opinion on the matter. It is hoped that the Government will be lenient with these unfortunate prisoners, and that they will be condemned to nothing worse than confinement within a fortress, a punishment in which they can always obtain a relaxation on parole during the day-time, so long as they return at night to their prison. The sympathy for the accused is increased in consequence of the number of persons who have already been delivered up by the authorities to the tender mercies of the Russians, as subjects of the Czar.

FRANCE.

The Emperor has left Fontainebleau, and has arrived at Vichy. We need not say that his reception was of the most enthusiastic description; triumphal arches, banners, and garlands decorated the road by which His Majesty entered the town. Idle gossip says that the visit to Vichy has been made earlier than was originally intended in consequence of some severe attacks which the Emperor has lately undergone, to which the waters of Vichy have before now given relief.

On the subject of the ships sold to the Prussian Government by the French, the Opinion Nationale says: 'It is with affliction we learn that France has herself undertaken to furnish Prussia with those engines of battle and destruction.' These ships were ironclad, built at Nantes and Bordeaux. The French Government forbade the builder in the most positive manner to deliver them to the parties for whom they were intended; one of the ships, the Jeddo, cleared out at Bordeaux for Amsterdam, and reached Bremerhaven, where she hoisted the Prussian flag; four others will soon follow the same destination. 'The peculiarity of the case is'—we quote from the Times of the 11th instant—'that the ships were built with the full knowledge and sanction, not to say encouragement, of the Government, which, though it may have subsequently changed its views, was under no necessity to have them sold to Prussia, a belligerent Power.' These observations come with great force from a journal which declares at the same time that the 'parties for whom the ships were originally intended' were the Confederate States.

Signor Verdi, the well-known composer and maestro, has been elected to the place of foreign associate of the Académie des Beaux Arts on the death of H. Meyerbeer.

RUSSIA.

A squadron of one ship of the line, three frigates, and two transports has been equipped at Cronstadt, where great naval preparations are being made. It is said that a Russian squadron of evolution will shortly touch at the Swedish and Danish ports in the Baltic.

On the 22nd ult., three hundred persons condemned to exile in Siberia set out for the scene of their punishment. The greater part of them belonged to the upper classes; but they were forced to walk like felons, chained together two and two, with their heads shaved. Several of them died of hunger and fatigue. There were some women among them; they tore the skin from their faces to destroy the beauty which was tempting their oppressors to a yet more infernal exhibition of their superiority. Every language but Russian has been forbidden in Poland, under pain of a fine of three hundred roubles (thirty pounds). The Governor of Warsaw has published a fresh edict with regard to the colour of the dresses worn by ladies: he informs them that black is seditious, black and white suspicious, that a border of coloured riband will not save a black silk robe from the crime of high treason; that black feathers in a bonnet are subject to the watchful vigilance of the Imperial Government. Having given these instructions, he requests that any lady who may find herself aggrieved by these regulations will call upon him in person to substantiate her grievance.

SWEDEN.

The Swedo-Norwegian squadron, the dispersal of which we lately announced, is to re-assemble off Gottenburg; it is to consist of two ships of the line, one frigate and one corvette (Swedish), two frigates and one corvette (Norwegian), besides some other vessels which are not yet completely prepared for sea. The Swedish Government has decided that the Russian squadron of exercise now cruising in the Baltic and Cattegat cannot be allowed to enter any Swedish port en masse, although single vessels forming part of it may be admitted. We put these two facts in juxta-position, as illustrating to some extent the embarrassing position in which Sweden is placed. Standing between a nation at war whom she would fain assist, and a neutral Power watchful to take every advantage, she has been forced to take such active measures as may formally protest against any encroachments on the part of Russia, while they cannot materially fulfil the hopes of Denmark.

BELGIUM.

We had occasion lately to mention the Ministerial crisis which took place some weeks back at Brussels. The 'right' or Conservative party had attempted to form a Ministry, but failed to do so in consequence of the intrigues of Liberals, who thereupon returned to office. The Conservatives have since then threatened to impede the progress of Government by absenting themselves from the Chambers, a threat which they have now put into execution. On the 5th instant the sittings were adjourned, because there were not enough members present to form a quorum. On the 6th the Liberals made a great whip and collected fifty-eight members; one more would have made up the required number: the one was M. Tesch, minister of justice, who was absent from Brussels for reasons of health; he has been summoned in hot haste. The public saluted the members on their appearance after this second adjournment with great applause; M. de Brouckère, who was suffering at the time from a severe illness, received a perfect ovation. On the 8th instant occurred a third failure in forming a House, the numbers again amounting to 58 only. On this occasion M. Cumont was absent in consequence of severe illness. He was forbidden positively by his physicians to attempt to enter the House, and yielded with difficulty to their orders. The honourable member died on the 10th instant, after expressing the greatest regret that he could do nothing to prevent the obstructions in the way of the Government. This event has excited lively sympathy in Brussels. On the 8th instant the Senate passed a vote of confidence in the Government, after a lively discussion, by a majority of 29 to 22; in the course of the debate, M. Osy, Senator for Antwerp, accused the Ministry of having stretched the cord of union between the people of Belgium as severely as did the King of Holland in 1827, and he warned them that a catastrophe must be the result of their obstinacy. The result of the conduct of Holland in 1827 was the Revolution which separated the kingdom of Belgium from that of Holland.

SPAIN.

There are rumours of disturbances in the province of Andalusia, which have for some time troubled the public of Madrid, and in the capital itself 'measures of precaution' have been taken in fear of some insurrectionary movement; the Epoca now declares that order reigns in every part of the kingdom. To the general English public Andalusia is less known and an object of less interest than Ashantee; but it is remarkable how close the secret of these troubles has been kept at a time when Spain is waging war in Santo Domingo, and making demonstrations in the Pacific. The squadron off Peru is to be reinforced by the frigates Numancia (ironclad), Berenguela, Blanca, Vencendora, and San Quintino; of these, the first and last only are steamers. We might be led to infer that Spain has got up the Peruvian difficulty as a cheap way of getting rid of its useless ships.

ITALY.

The Austrian police have found reason for making fresh searches after the correspondents of the Venetian Committee in Venice. Five persons have been arrested, of whom one is a Government official. They will probably be tried by court-martial.

A trial which has made some noise in Italy is that brought about by the claim of the Prince de Crouy Chanel to the titles and possessions of the dukedom of Este against their present possessor, the ex-Duke of Modena. The civil tribunal of Modena has just published its judgment on the subject, and it is looked upon by Italians as a marvel of ingenuity, if not of justice. The first question raised was as to the jurisdiction of the Court. On this the Court said that it considered itself competent so far as concerned the subject-matter of the cause—i. e., the title and possessions—but incompetent as to the person complained of; the ex-duke being a stranger, having lost his rights of citizenship and his domicile by leaving the country without permission of the Government, and without expectation of returning. The Court, therefore, decline to examine further into the case. The Prince de Crouy Chanel has appealed against the decision.

CHINA.

The Franco-Chinese force under M. d'Aiguebelle have succeeded in taking by assault the town of Hang-chu, after a two months' siege and one unsuccessful attempt. The town was abandoned by the rebels on the night of March 30, who at the same time evacuated Hu-tang. The effect of the surrender of these queerly-named towns is that the Taepings have lost possession of all the country which they formerly commanded, save Nankin, the second capital of the Chinese Empire. The capture of this important city is now only a matter of time, and the ultimate defeat of the rebels is looked upon as certain.

MEXICO.

A series of interesting letters have been addressed to the Constitutionnel by a correspondent, entitled 'De Miramar à Mexico.' As the name imports, they give an account of the voyage of the Emperor and Empress of Mexico. We extract from one of the most recent letters some instructive observations on the aboriginal inhabitants of the new Empire. 'Among the authorities whom the Emperor received at Cordova were several deputations from the Indians. They were easily to be recognised by their physiognomy, their attitudes, and their costumes. The chiefs carried a long slender cane as an emblem of command. The greater part of them speak a pure Castilian. His Majesty has in his immediate attendance an Indian of the name of Faustino Chimal-Popoca, a descendant of the fourth Emperor of Mexico, who acts as interpreter. Chimal-Popoca has a thorough knowledge of the five most important of the Mexican dialects, of which it is said there are about sixty. It would be an error to suppose that the descendants of the Aztecs are an ignorant people. It has been officially stated that the greater number of them can read and write. The aboriginal race, as is well known, forms the broad and solid basis of the Mexican people. It has never been submitted to an exact census, but is generally numbered at between six and seven millions. It was oppressed by the Spanish viceroys, and only called into political existence by the revolutionary Governments in order to bear the burdens of the taxation. From first to last it has been treated as a strange people. What marvel then if it is of a timid nature? What marvel if the Indian loves to hide himself from the sight of man, and to build his hut under the protecting shade of the forest trees far from European paths? The arrival of the Emperor has filled them with exultation; they could scarcely believe it, but they waited with patience till better days should come. Now, by the help of that marvellous power, by which barbarous nations can send news by word of mouth from one end to the other of their country with lightning rapidity, the word has been said, the Emperor is actually in Mexico; within two days of his arrival the Indian deputations waited upon him to offer him their homage and their congratulations. It is on the Indian race that the future of Mexico depends; the Indian is intelligent, studious, laborious, sober, economical, and virtuous; he is, moreover, a lover of order and of progress, and most willing to submit himself to the laws.' This account may be somewhat tinged with that couleur de rose which colours every statement that we make concerning the first land we visit after a long sea-voyage; but, if we allow for a certain pardonable enthusiasm, we may learn a fact of the greatest importance, that the destiny of the Empire of Mexico is committed into the hands of the aboriginal Mexicans. We shall watch with the greatest sympathy and interest to see the results of this great experiment.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE VOTE OF CENSURE.

Both Houses of Parliament were on Friday night scenes of unusual excitement. We cannot say that in both Houses the Ministry was on its trial, because the decision of the House of Lords on a question of confidence can neither save nor destroy a Cabinet. If Ministers had been beaten in the Commons, a victory in the Lords would have done them no good, and as they were victorious in the Commons, the defeat in the Lords did them no harm—that is, it did not involve either a resignation of office or a dissolution of Parliament. But in both Houses the most important question of the Session was to be discussed, and the vote of the Commons was to decide whether Lord Palmerston would have to resign office or to appeal to the country.

The debates were very voluminous—those on Friday occupy no less than seven closely printed pages of the Times—and it is therefore impossible with our limited space to offer a summary of the speeches; so we must content ourselves with merely chronicling the results.

In the Lords a resolution was moved by Lord Malmesbury, which was nearly identical with the address moved in the Commons. After an animated debate, which, however, lost much of its brilliancy from the enforced absence of the Earl of Derby and the Earl of Ellenborough, their Lordships divided as follows:—

Contents—Present	119
Contents—Proxies	58
	177
Non-contents—Present	123
Non-contents—Proxies	45
	168
Majority against the Government	9

It will be seen that no fewer than 244 peers were present, and that of these a majority of 4 were in favour of the Government. There were 103 proxies, and of these a majority of 13 were in favour of the Opposition. The Conservatives, then, have a clear majority in the House of Lords, and a glance at the division list shows that that majority would have been much greater if it had not been for Lord Palmerston's numerous opportunities of nominating bishops of Liberal principles.

The House of Commons divided a few minutes before two o'clock on Saturday morning on Mr. Kinglake's amendment, which was carried by a majority of 18 for the Government, the numbers being 313 to 295.

Five Conservative members voted with the Government, and 18 Liberal Irish members voted for the Opposition. The following analysis of the division is useful as an indication of the strength of parties:—

During the debate in the Commons a great deal of excitement was manifested on both sides of the House, and this led to a 'scene' on Thursday evening. Mr. Layard charged the Opposition with falsifying—that is, garbling—their extracts from the blue-book; and Mr. Hardy said that Mr. Layard had made a calumnious statement. The Speaker was appealed to, and ruled that the term was justified by the provocation given. Lord Palmerston and the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the decision of the Speaker. At length Mr. Layard expressed his regret for using the term 'false,' and next night Mr. Gladstone expressed his sincere regret that he had used the term 'falsification,' which exceeded the due license of debate. Altogether, what occurred in the House of Commons last week must have greatly consoled those persons who have been mourning the decay of party spirit, in the existence of which they will not believe except upon the evidence of an angry and acrimonious debate.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Lord Proby, who, as Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household, appeared at the bar with his wand of office, said, 'I am the bearer of an answer from Her Majesty to the Address of this House on the subject of Denmark.' The noble Lord then read as follows:—

'I have received your Address thanking me for directing the correspondence on Denmark and Germany and the Protocols of the Conference recently held in London to be laid before Parliament. I share your deep concern that the sittings of the Conference have been brought to a close without accomplishing the important purposes for which it was convened. I am happy to be assured of your satisfaction at the course I have felt it my duty to take in this conjuncture in not engaging in armed interference in the war now going on between Denmark and the German Powers.'

SIR F. B. HEAD.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Sir W. Jolliffe called attention to the memorial of Sir F. Head to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, which was laid on the table on June 6, and to move 'That in the opinion of this House the great but hitherto unrequited services rendered by Sir F. B. Head, when Governor of Upper Canada, in the years 1837 and 1838, call for the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.' By that memorial and the other document which accompanied it having been laid on its table, the House, he thought, was called upon to exercise its function on the matter to which they referred, and it ought to offer some expression of its sympathy with the very strong case which Sir F. Head had made out to the Colonial Office. He fully admitted that the services of that distinguished man were of a character which required that some time should elapse before they could be properly appreciated. He therefore found no fault with any Minister past or present. A great change was then inaugurated in our colonial policy, and it was a change, he believed, in the right direction. He thought it quite proper that they should endeavour to make the colonies self-supporting and self-dependent at the earliest period; and if ever there was a man who had successfully taught that policy to a colony, it was Sir Francis Head. He denuded his own Government of the troops and militia, and sent them to the assistance of Lord Colborne, and, notwithstanding the sacrifices he thus made, he put down rebellion in his own province by infusing into those whom he governed a spirit of loyalty and self-dependence which enabled him to accomplish the greatest results. In acknowledgment of his very meritorious services Sir Francis Head received various addresses on retiring from his Government from the British Minister at Washington, from the Upper and Lower Houses of the Canadian Parliament, from the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia, and from Sir George Arthur, who had succeeded him in his Government. Lord Glenelg, also, the Colonial Minister of that day, in giving instructions to Sir George Arthur, paid the highest compliments to the uncompromising firmness, energy, frank and open bearing of Sir Francis, whose conduct he held up as an example in all respects worthy of imitation. This was 26 years ago, and Sir Francis Head had up to the present time been unrewarded.

Mr. Cardwell did not deny the valuable services of Sir F. Head, and he intimated that a provision would be introduced into the Bill for granting pensions to Colonial Governors by which Sir F. Head's services would be rewarded. Sir J. Pakington hoped that Sir F. Head would get something better than fine words for the manifestation of courage and public spirit by which the province of Upper Canada had undoubtedly been saved. The case of Sir F. Head, however, did not stand on the same footing as that of other colonial governors. He was persuaded, against his own inclinations, to accept the Governorship of Canada, he giving up an appointment which he then held as Poor Law Inspector, with a salary of 1,000*l.* per annum. When he returned from his successful governorship Sir F. Head applied to be permitted to resume his old office, but his request was refused. The consequence was that he had been a poor man ever since, although his claims in point of justice and good feeling were irresistible.

Sir F. Smith, Mr. Adderley, Mr. Angerstin, and Mr. Newdegate, bore strong testimony to the merits of Sir F. B. Head.

BRAZIL AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, there was an animated and rather angry conversation about Brazil and the slave-trade. In reply to honourable members Lord Palmerston said the conduct of the Brazilian Government in regard to the slave-trade had been invariably marked by a flagrant violation of treaty engagements. If since 1852 Brazil had put down the slave-trade, it was by compulsion and not by conviction. Mr. Bright desired the repeal of the 'Aberdeen Act,' without which there could not be renewed friendly relations between the two countries. Lord Palmerston replied that the repeal of the 'Aberdeen Act' would revive the slave-trade. Lord J. Manners intimated that Lord Palmerston had been quoting from a newspaper, and not from a blue-book. According to the report of the Times, Lord Palmerston said, 'This is the blue-book from which I quote (tossing the paper across the table to the noble Lord).'

SYMPTOMS OF A NEW SECESSION.

THE following letter from Colonel Anderson, declining the nomination of State Elector on the Ohio Democratic State ticket, has appeared in the Columbus Crisis, and was published in the Times of Monday.

Seven Oaks, April 24, 1864.

Dear Colonel,—I ask permission through your columns to withdraw my name as a candidate for Presidential Elector in the Twelfth Congressional District of Ohio. There may be a seeming unfitness in selecting your paper as the medium of publication, but I hope by a few words to explain and justify my course. My acknowledgments are due, and they are hereby tendered, to the Circleville Democrat for the very complimentary, for the flattering notice it made of my nomination at the State Convention at Columbus. The announcement that my nomination 'meets the hearty approbation of every Democrat in the district,' and that 'a more worthy gentleman or better Democrat could not have been chosen,' is more than agreeable, it is highly gratifying. But, sir, though no man feels more sensibly the approbation of his fellow-men, though no one can prize more highly that harmonious combination of gentleman and Democrat, I prefer the sanction of my own conscience to the approval of men or multitudes, and my test of the 'gentleman and Democrat' shall be the truth, sincerely felt and fearlessly spoken.

I do not accept the nomination for one of two reasons—either I do not understand the opinions and convictions of my nominators, or they did not understand mine. It is not my wish or intention to deceive or be deceived. I want every voter to know that I am diametrically opposed to the continuance of this war. I will not and cannot consent to advocate and sustain any man, be he soldier or civilian, who is in favour of its prosecution. I now fully realise and comprehend the meaning of the term 'horrida bella.' Now that 'rampant war has yoked her red dragons to her iron car'—now that all humanity, all magnanimity, is trampled under feet—I feel its full force. Our generals blush behind the buckler of Mars, while the she-devil Bellona, with blazing torch, lights on our arms to an ignominious victory over women and children.

Hannibal crossed the Alps and remained for thirty years in the heart of the Roman Empire, defeating their armies, defying their power. Does the example of that heathen leader teach us nothing? He passed through an enemy's country and left friends behind. Carthaginians and Romans met in battle, but neither waged a war of desolation on women and children. Kindness, consideration, and manly forbearance marked his course. Our warriors silence the cries of hunger with stones, and enlighten the darkness of distress with fiery faggots. In very truth, this war is carried on in such a brutal and barbarous manner—it is so disgraceful to the Government, so degrading to the soldiery—that it is surprising no new vocabulary has been invented to explain the terms of our advanced, much improved civilisation. It is easier to declare what we should do than to lay down an unchangeable law for our future conduct. To me it is very clear that Democrats should never sacrifice principle to popularity—better suffer defeat, contending for the right and principles of freemen, than obtain success by fraud and falsehood.

In one case, sustained by a vigorous vitality, we should rise fresh and strong; in the other, after tottering along with uncertain step, we would faint and fall from our own weariness and corruption. I am not for an available candidate—I am for a candidate who would lead us on under the banner of the Constitution—our motto, 'Union and Liberty, or no Union at all.' My hope, my prayer, is that when monarchical power 'is concentrated and centralised in Washington,' that one thousand daggers may pierce the heart of the first crowned villain! We should remember that 'eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.' I bid you, I beg you, watch! Seize your trumpet, and at the first alarming moment send forth the words of warning. What, sir, is the condition of our country? Over, above, and pressing down on our national burdens, we poor Western serfs are crushed to the earth by our factory masters, by Lowell lords and shoddy ladies. Peasants and heroes of the West, you are but tenant vassals for the nabobs of the East. Eat, sleep, and be happy! I say awake, arise, freemen of the West, arise! Spring up from your night of sloth, or your day of resurrection may never dawn!

Editor of the Crisis, 'agitate.' If we cannot have our glorious old Union let us have God and Nature's Union! Let us follow the bright sparkling waters of the Ohio, down to the Father of Waters—down to the ocean of peace. The greatest and grandest valley in the world claims us for her own; let us acknowledge her claim. If so, I will divide the honour with a member of the Cabinet. He said to Orestes A. Brownson, 'I am tired of fighting Southern slavery; I will have nothing more to do with slaveholders; I am in for a Northern Confederacy.' My parody on that is, I am tired of working for Yankee taskmasters; I hate their selfish meanness; and therefore I am in favour of a Western Confederacy. I have paid tribute long enough to the looms and spindles of the East; I wish no longer to be the political pack mule of New England. They have taught me that when the burden becomes intolerable I have a right to throw it off. They invented the word 'secede,' and they have inculcated the doctrine that an oppressed people are justified in separating from their oppressors, 'peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must.'

Of course, dear Crisis, my proposition is predicated on the fact that the original Union is dissolved. No man is fool or fanatic enough to doubt it. Not even the Arcadian Nightingale of the White House can any longer sing the song 'of the Union and the Constitution.' The master minds of this nation, who are determined to rule or ruin it, have presented the alternative to the South of 'subjugation or miscegenation!' What! a free-born American people become subjugated, or descend to the lowest depth of human degradation by mingling the blood of their daughters with that of their slaves?

The Union is dissolved. From the moment the confiscation laws, the proclamation laws were published, from that moment the Union ceased to exist.

With sadness and sorrow, but not entirely without hope, I am your fellow-sufferer,

W. MARSHALL ANDERSON.

The New York correspondent of the Times writes:—

'This is strong language. Will the Government allow Colonel Anderson to preach such doctrine unchallenged and unmolested? Time will show. Sufficient, however, is known of the state of popular feeling in Ohio and Indiana to warrant the belief that startling news may be expected from that quarter.'

THE REPORTED RESIGNATION OF MR. MEMMINGER.

THE following report of the proceedings in the Confederate House of Representatives on the eve of adjournment, shows the foundation of the report circulated by the New York Herald, that Mr. Memminger, the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, had resigned:—

In the House of Representatives, June 14, Mr. Foote said that he would like to introduce a resolution enquiring of the Committee on the Judiciary what had become of his resolution concerning Mr. Memminger. He understood that the gentleman was authorised to make a statement in reference to Mr. Memminger, which would set the matter at rest and preclude the necessity of his pressing the matter further.

Mr. Conrad said that he did not think that, under the circumstances, he ought to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee. It would not be just to the Secretary of the Treasury to make a statement which might indicate a desire to avert a threatened motion directed against him, and, as the gentleman had intimated his intention to make such a motion, he must decline answering the question.

Mr. Foote said he withdrew his remark, and hoped the member from Louisiana would repeat the statement made some time ago as to the intentions of the Secretary.

Mr. Conrad said, after what had just fallen from the member from Tennessee, he had no objection to repeat the statement which he had made some time ago, which was that, some time previous, the Secretary of the Treasury had declared to him that it was his intention to resign his office at the end of the present session. It was proper to add, however, that this declaration was made some time before the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, and had no reference to the action of this House in regard to him, but was a casual remark, dropped by him in a conversation which he (Mr. Conrad) had with him in reference to matters then pending before the committee.

Mr. Foote said that he was authorised to say that a member of the Senate had the solemn declaration of Mr. Memminger that he intended to resign his office; and that the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee had the same statement from the Secretary's own lips. This being the case, he did not press his resolution.

Mr. Russell, on the part of the committee appointed to act in conjunction with the Senate Committee, appointed to wait on the President, and inform him of the readiness of the House to adjourn, reported that the President stated that he had nothing further to communicate, save the approval of several Bills which he was now examining. The President desires to express his wish for the health and happiness of the members, and their safe return to their homes, and that he had hopes that before the meeting of the next Congress our country will have surmounted the difficulties and dangers which surround it, and Providence will have given us bright and happy prospects.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Speaker announced the House of Representatives adjourned sine die.

PROMOTIONS AND ASSIGNMENTS.—The following promotions and assignments are announced in a special order from the head-quarters of the Confederate army:—

Major-General J. B. Kershaw, permanently to the command of M'Laws's Division.

Brigadier-General Bryan Grimes, permanently to the command of Daniels's (N. C.) Brigade.

Brigadier-General James Conner, temporarily to the command of M'Gowan's Brigade.

Brigadier-General Rufus Barringer, permanently to Gordon's Brigade of Cavalry.

Brigadier-General John M'Causland, permanently to Jenkins's Cavalry Brigade.

Brigadier-General William B. Cox, temporarily to Ramseur's Brigade.

Brigadier-General Thomas Toon, temporarily to Johnson's (N.C.) Brigade.

Brigadier-General William G. Lewis, temporarily to Hoke's Brigade.

Brigadier-General Lilly, temporarily to Pegram's Brigade.

Brigadier-General Zebulon York, temporarily to Hays's and Stafford's Brigade.

Major-General Ramseur, temporarily to Early's Division.

Major-General Mahone, temporarily to Anderson's Division.

Lieutenant-General R. H. Anderson, temporarily to Longstreet's Corps.

Lieutenant-General J. A. Early, temporarily to Ewell's Corps.

CONSOLATION FOR MR. LINCOLN.—The New York World writes:—'Some of the court journals are trying to disguise a compliment to Mr. Lincoln's courage by gently reprimanding him for exposing his person to the rebel sharpshooters while riding at the front with General Butler during his recent visit to General Grant's army. The President was perfectly safe. The rebel sharpshooter who had levelled his piece at him would have been court-martialled and shot by his own commanders. Nothing is of more importance to the rebel cause than that Mr. Lincoln shall live out his term, except, indeed, it be his re-election.'

'SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE' IN THE MACCLESFIELD DISTRICT.

A PUBLIC meeting was held on Tuesday evening, in the Church Institute, Tintwistle (Macclesfield), to adopt a resolution on behalf of the inhabitants of Mottram, Hollingworth, Hadfield, and the other populous towns and villages in that manufacturing district, urging upon Her Majesty's Government the propriety of offering friendly counsel to the belligerents in the American war, and, in the event of the failure of such a measure by reason of the obstinacy of the North, to enter into concert with other European Powers with a view to the recognition of the Southern Confederacy.

The meeting was very largely attended, and partook somewhat of the character of an assembly of delegates from the various townships in the hundred of Macclesfield. Representatives attended from Glossop (Derbyshire), Stockport (Cheshire), and other towns of importance.

James Sidebottam, Esq., one of the most influential men in the district, presided, and was supported by a large body of gentlemen, clerical and lay, who appeared to enjoy the confidence of the working men in that locality.

The Chairman, after a few introductory remarks upon the importance of the occasion upon which they had assembled, hoped that the voice of the people of the cotton districts would be intelligibly expressed, and he did not doubt that, judging from the crisis of affairs in America, the Government would think this a fitting season for paying attention to the expressed wishes of the people of this country. He concluded by introducing to the meeting W. E. Stutter, Esq., of the Southern Independence Association.

Mr. Stutter was received with loud applause. We had witnessed, he said, three years of desperate warfare in America, with no results pointing to the subjugation of the South by the North; three years of almost inconceivable carnage, with the indomitable pluck of the Southern people still in the ascendant; three years of commercial depression in Lancashire, and not a ray of hope for the return of our industrial prosperity. The latest accounts showed that the prospects of the Federal general grew darker every day. In his attempt to capture Richmond—a small spot in the Southern Confederacy—he had already lost 35 per cent. of his army. General Lee, as the Times confidently prophesied, would, at no distant date, effectually consign Grant's invasion of Virginia to the page of history, to rank with the failures of M'Clellan, Pope, Hooker, and Burnside. If that were a true picture of the relations between the actual combatants now on the scene, what was to be said of another feature in the struggle that was threatening to become one of perilous prominence? What was to be said of the growing disaffection in the West? The people of that vast agricultural district had begun to cry out against the oppression of Northern rule; and, singularly enough, Colonel Anderson, brother to General Robert Anderson of Fort Sumter notoriety, had come forward as the spokesman of the sentiments of the Western States. He is opposed, he says, to the continuance of the war. He is tired of working for Yankee taskmasters. He hates their selfish meanness. He will no longer be the political 'pack-mule' of New England. The Northerners invented the word 'secede,' and they have persistently preached the doctrine that an oppressed people are justified in separating from their oppressors, 'peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must.' Mr. Stutter then entered more at large upon the technical right of secession, the question of the tariff, the preponderance of the North in the representative councils of the Union, and he argued that for these reasons alone the Southern States had a right to avail themselves of the constitutional privilege of seceding from the Confederation. After giving an effective description of the progress of the Southern States in self-government, for which, he said, they had developed, under circumstances of tremendous difficulty, a genius which was little less than marvellous, he contended it was the duty of European Powers to save the North from the consequences of its own folly, for before long the Unionists would have to run the gauntlet of a Western as well as a Southern secession. In conclusion, he urged upon the working men of Lancashire to weigh well the consequences that would result to themselves from the continuance of this most unjust and most unnecessary of wars. If the Southern people had justice on their side, as he maintained they had, then the slaughter that had been forced upon them was a crime in the sight of God and man, and all who not only countenanced but magnified and perpetuated it were participators in that great sin. Three years of heroic struggle, three years of wonderful self-denial, three years of valorous chivalry, ought to entitle the brave Southern people to recognition by the Government of England. The prospects, too, of our own country, the condition of industrial pursuits in the great manufacturing districts of Lancashire, demanded that the raw material requisite for our prosperity should not be held back because a wicked and vindictive section of the American people desired to consolidate their power by crushing the political liberties and destroying the social happiness of an integral branch of the ancient Anglo-Saxon race.

At the conclusion of Mr. Stutter's address, which was frequently and enthusiastically applauded, several questions were asked by working men in the body of the hall, and answered apparently to their satisfaction; for when the resolution above referred to was put to the meeting, it was carried with acclamation and without a single dissentient voice.

The following petition to the House of Commons was also unanimously adopted, and a copy of it, signed by the Chairman on behalf of the meeting, will be forwarded for presentation to-morrow evening:—

'To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom in Parliament assembled.

'The humble Petition of the magistrates, councillors, tradesmen, manufacturers, shopkeepers, and other inhabitants of the townships of the hundred of Macclesfield, in public meeting assembled,

'Showeth: That your Petitioners, believing that the war in America is an injury to the world, that its events have fully demonstrated that the Federal Government cannot subjugate and hold in subjection the people of the Southern States, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, are of opinion that to protract the contest can only result in a useless destruction of life and property on that continent, and in the infliction of serious injury on the cotton districts of our own country.

'Wherefore, your Petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House will be pleased to take such steps as may in your judgment most rapidly lead to the re-establishment of peace.

'And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

(Signed) 'JAMES SIDEBOTTAM,
'Chairman of the Meeting.'

The assembly broke up with a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and three cheers for the South.

CONFEDERATE AND FEDERAL FINANCES.

THE Confederate loan is at 69 to 71, so that notwithstanding the unexpected extent to which during the last three years the war for the subjugation of the South has been supported by Irish mercenaries and German and Dutch capital, these bonds are now at a price which, reckoning dividends, sinking fund, and allowances provided for meanwhile, would involve little more loss to the original subscribers than that of interest from the date of its introduction. Times, City Article, July 11.

The Secretary of the Treasury at Washington has obtained power to issue further 6 per cent. bonds to the amount of 80,000,000*l.*, the interest to be paid in coin. An annual addition of 4,800,000*l.* is therefore to be made to the demand for gold. With previously existing requirements, the sum to be raised yearly by the Government in specie will accordingly be brought up to about 20,000,000*l.* As a very large portion of the Federal debt is held in Germany and Holland, where agents have been employed at splendid rates of commission to tempt all the quiet saving classes to adopt these securities in preference to those of their own Governments, the periodical remittances for interest to Europe must be in proportion. Already the expenditure of the Federal Government and the general consumption of imported goods is on a scale the payment for which not only absorbs all the metallic supply from San Francisco, but leaves an enormous balance to be furnished from whatever hoards of gold may yet remain in the country. No one can decide how long these funds will be forthcoming, but all can understand that the question of stoppage must be simply one of time. Previously to the war the people, in consequence of abundant harvests, had become rich in gold, and the substitution of inconvertible paper for a metallic currency has since rendered a large additional amount available for exportation. But taking any preposterous estimate that the most sanguine Federal could suggest as the probable aggregate of specie thus disposable, the end can easily be calculated. For three or four years the drain has already been continuous, and as it may be assumed that before the country could be swept of all its cash a panic would set in that would lead to hoarding, it is impossible to doubt that the final hour is rapidly approaching. That it has been delayed so long is solely consequent on the fact that the sale of bonds in Germany and Holland has enabled specie for their amount to be obtained from those countries. In proportion as such drafts can continue to be made, so long will the break-up be partially retarded, but there is reason to apprehend that these investors will never get a dividend in coin, except so long as they continue to supply the coin themselves. It is not a question of honesty on the part of the United States. It is one of possibility. They may on the face of their bonds promise to pay in gold, and in their financial ignorance they may believe they will be able to do so. But will they explain where the gold is to come from? Up to a certain stage, even in this country, Mr. Chase found people who were astonished at his 'success,' and who talked of his financial ability. Some of these parties were also angry that any doubt should be thrown upon the financial sagacity of a people so remarkable for their devotion to trade and money-making. But they were warned that the success was simply that of a spendthrift, who will not pull up so long as he has a fragment of property or credit he can make away with, and that just according to the prolongation of the game would be the extent of ultimate ruin. At first the mere prediction that a suspension of specie payments would rapidly ensue was treated as an idle manifestation of ill-will, and subsequently the anticipations that gold would go to 50 per cent. premium, and from 50 per cent. to 100, were met with still stronger protestations. This determination to shut out all logical conclusions has, happily, not been sufficiently powerful to cause mischief in London, but on the Continent the delusion has been so extensive that there can be no doubt of most serious consequences whenever it shall be dispelled. At the present moment purchases are actively continued, each new fall in price merely inducing previous holders to buy more in order to make an average. At the beginning of this year the Washington Government despatched to Europe two persons of position and influence to ascertain what was the prospect for raising loans. One of these agents, the Hon. Robert J. Walker, published a pamphlet in London to show the finances and resources of America. Gold, after having some time previously touched 73 premium, had then receded to 27. This Mr. Walker pointed out to be a natural consequence of Mr. Chase's system—a system which in its completeness and brilliancy was 'without a precedent in history.' 'It is not doubted,' Mr. Walker continued, 'that before June 30 next this premium must disappear;' and he accordingly urged all possessors of gold to take advantage of it and invest in Federal Bonds while there was yet time at such favourable terms. We have yet to learn what was the actual quotation of gold at New York on Thursday last, the predicted June 30; but it happened that that which had then arrived in London was 145 premium. The moral is surely plain. Although there is no need to charge Mr. Walker with any want of sincerity, the fallibility of judgment he and his compatriots have shown should lead to the exercise of great caution in any future representations with the view of inducing the industrial populations of Europe to part with the hardly earned means which constitute in many cases their sole provision for old age.—Times, City Article, July 8.

A partial rally in United States Bonds occurred to-day, and some large amounts were again taken for the Continent. The recovery was consequent on the reported resignation of Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury. Looking at the point to which he has brought the Federal finances, it is only natural that a rumour of his retirement should create an improved feeling; but whoever may be his successor, only one course is open to arrest the present ruin, and there seems as little prospect as at any former time of its being adopted. A cessation of the war is the sole condition on which even the faintest hope of anything short of an utter financial breakdown can be based. If the war were to cease to-morrow, the Federal Government, upon all its affairs being wound up, would find itself with a debt the weight of which in the shape of interest would be about one-fourth greater than that of the United Kingdom, while the population to meet it would be about a third or a fourth less. Such is the view under the best circumstances, and even those who believe that a country where the rudiments of free trade have not yet been recognised can successfully struggle under these circumstances, and that the honesty of the American nation, with its weekly influx of thousands of German and Irish immigrants, will be proof against all temptations to throw off the burden, must admit that it is an anxious one. It allows nothing for the maintenance of an army to threaten the South for the future, and assumes a state of perfect and prolonged economy and peace, all such temptations as are offered by Canada and Mexico and San Domingo being for ever shut out. Instead, however, of any such promise, we have in all the latest letters and journals from New York nothing but the old confidence that the capture of Richmond and the submission of the Confederacy is simply a question of time. If the Finance Minister is not to be allowed to starve the war, he can have no choice but to issue more loans or additional paper currency. If he limits himself to loans there is a certainty that gold will fall until their value be once more restored, and the paper currency will of necessity receive a little from the depreciation. Should he choose the alternative of pouring out fresh notes, then the premium on gold will pursue its course, and the paper price of stocks will rise in proportion as the currency becomes more and more like the assignats of the French Revolution. Or he may mingle both courses, as has hitherto been the policy, and thus continue to bring upon the country the mixed evils of the two systems. As far as the welfare of the nation is concerned, it matters little which of the plans is selected. They lead alike to irretrievable anarchy. Hence, unless Mr Lincoln means peace, there is no use in his changing his Finance Minister. For providing the means for an expenditure of 200 millions sterling a year no one could excel Mr. Chase, who has adroitly contrived to get as large a proportion of it as possible from foreign admirers. Times, City Article, July 13.

SALOON CARRIAGES.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The horrible crime which now occupies universal attention, and which recalls a similar tragedy a year or two ago in France, of which a distinguished member of the French bar was the victim, concerns the travelling public the world over. It is surprising to me that, among the numerous suggestions made through the press, not one touches seriously the only radical remedy applicable to an evil which we may expect to become epidemical. All the various modes of signalling the guard are clearly inefficient. Without referring to their obvious liability to abuse by timid old ladies or mischievous young collegians, a person in sudden danger, even if possessing the necessary presence of mind, would seldom be left by the assailant the opportunity of using this mode of escape. Steps by which the guards may pass from carriage to carriage while in motion, as is the case in French railways, are useful so far as they go, but the guards rarely perform this circuit more than once in a long journey, and it is in the remembrance of every one that this precaution did not avert a crime almost precisely similar in its details within the last two years. The only remedy is in the compulsory abandonment of the present absurd system of packing, or rather imprisoning, railway passengers. This system, accidentally adopted at first, has not a single merit to recommend, much less defend it. It neither secures privacy nor convenience, nor does it economise space. Every one of these requisites is better met in saloon carriages, divided, if it is desired, into classes, and into compartments of various sizes, but opening into each other, and the carriages themselves, which is easily done, communicating with each other. This is the one redeeming feature of the many abominations of American railway travelling; and every one who has made the continuous journey of four or five days and nights, say from New York to New Orleans, can bear testimony to the lessening of fatigue which results from the faculty of locomotion, of seeing friends on the same train, not to mention other still more important conveniences of saloon carriages. This system, without the American abuse of making everybody herd together, is adopted in the railways of Switzerland and many parts of the extreme north of Europe. Its merits are that, while the traveller can be as private and exclusive as he pleases, he can at any moment place himself in communication with his fellow-travellers and the guard. Even if the communicating doors are kept closed, there is an immense difference between a closed door and a thickly-stuffed division. To a certain extent, but in an uncomfortable fashion, the saloon carriage is adopted for the cheaper fares on the 'omnibus' trains of several French railways. A better proof of its advantages is that carriages built for royalty, or other distinguished persons, are always made after the saloon model. On the Great Western Railway and its branches there are one or two for first-class travellers, but not perfect ones. In practice there is no reason whatever why railway travelling should not be made as comfortable in every respect as ocean travel; and an Act of Parliament compelling railway companies to comply with the dictates of common sense in the building of new carriages would insure, in the course of a very few years, an entire replacement of that species of conveyance, without entailing loss on the companies. AN OLD TRAVELLER.

London, July, 1864.

MODUS OPERANDI OF FEDERAL RECRUITING.—The New York Correspondent of the Daily News, who must be considered excellent authority on everything that concerns the interests of his employers, makes the following curious revelations in an attempt to vindicate the Washington Government from the charge of recruiting:—'In the first place, fifteen dollars were offered in New York to "anybody bringing in a recruit." The object of this was to interest somebody in doing the indispensable work of canvassing, of hunting up those who were likely to join the army, and in persuading them to join. This work has to be done by somebody. In England it is done by officers and non-commissioned officers specially detailed for this service, and directed (see the late circular of the Duke of Cambridge) to frequent fairs, markets, and all other places resorted to by idle or adventurous or needy men; and in spite of their exertions, it is found no easy matter to keep the British army, small as it is, up to the required strength. Suppose it were suddenly raised to 600,000 men, and that gaps of tremendous size were being daily made in it by the casualties and disease of a bloody war, do you suppose the regular recruiting service would be the only agency to which the Government would resort to keep its ranks full? Do you imagine that it would be saved the necessity of canvassing altogether by the spontaneous rush into the service, as private soldiers, of the "genteel" people, who are now filled with such horror because the Americans make no scruple about employing mercenaries? The brokers here, however, not only pocket the "hand money" for bringing the recruit, but they in general manage to share the bounty also. That they should be able to [illegible] of the community of the most [illegible] that they [illegible] to such an extent [illegible] they have made large fortunes by the [illegible]. They [illegible] the trade all over the country, expense to them what may, and by employing offices [illegible] getting [illegible] to seek them. It is not [illegible] a chance that money is being made in the present [illegible] other than the proper office to apply to, and [illegible] aware of the thousand advantages which a shrewd city [illegible] possesses over country [illegible], and especially over [illegible] to enable them to get hold of a large share of the money. I have heard of cases in which out of fifteen dollars [illegible] and I think there were few men enlisted through the instrumentality of the brokers in the city at whom the [illegible] managed to retain over fifteen dollars. You will see from this that when men are called for by the 200,000 or 300,000 the profits of the business must be enormous. The slave trade can hardly compare with it. If a broker only [illegible] a week it was really paid. There were few of the [illegible] ones who did not bring in a dozen a week. Now, you will see that enough men, with [illegible] to such a trade within the [illegible], would [illegible] to any one State or district. They scoured all possible parts of the United States and Canada for recruits, and [illegible] I do not know of their having gone to Ireland. I should be greatly astonished to find they had not done so. In no place are recruits so easily procured, especially for America, and no men make better soldiers than Irishmen. It would therefore be the most natural thing in the world if every broker in New York had his agent in Cork and Limerick and Galway, picking up and despatching to him every able-bodied man he could lay hands on.'

CONFEDERATE SHIPS IN FRANCE.—The Paris correspondent of the Times, under date of July 8, makes the following curious revelations about the change of ownership of certain vessels in French dockyards, supposed to have been originally destined for the Confederate Government:—'It was at the season when the Government, or the Emperor, was amicably disposed towards the Southern Confederacy that leave was very readily and willingly given for the building at Nantes and Bordeaux of certain vessels nominally for commercial objects, but really for war. There were, I believe, two steam corvettes and two rams. "Leave," perhaps, is not the proper word, encouragement or even instigation, would be the suitable term. During the building, or just as it was nearly concluded, the change I allude to was visible in the Government, and to whatever cause it is to be attributed, the parties who had authorised, encouraged, or instigated it sent orders that the vessels should not be delivered over to the Confederates, but should either be disposed of to a third party not belligerent, or detained in port till the war in America was brought to a conclusion. Something was said about the Swedish Government being in treaty for the ships; but, if so, nothing came of it. A private letter from Bordeaux now mentions that, though the ground alleged for detaining these ships was that they were constructed for a belligerent, the corvettes and the ram have been just sold to the Prussian Government—though Prussia is a belligerent,—and that one of them, the Yeddo, cleared out of Bordeaux some few days ago, ostensibly for Amsterdam, and proceeded to Bremerhaven, where, probably, she has taken on board her war material and crew, and is now, or will soon be, anchored in a Prussian port, flying the Prussian flag, and ready to act against Denmark. It is further stated that this transfer to a belligerent was effected not merely with the sanction, but by order of the Government. It was stated in one of the Paris papers a day or two ago that the Yeddo had been sold since its its completion to the Confederate Government, to replace the Alabama, and when at sea was to take on board all that was necessary for her equipment. The statement was not true, and in all probability the Danes will hear something of her and her companions before long. This does not look like neutrality towards belligerents, and it looks still less like a friendly weakness on the part of the French Government towards its old ally, Denmark. There are other details in the letter I refer to which I omit, but the delivery to Prussia, under official sanction, of ships built, also under official sanction, for the Confederate Government, is, I am assured, a fact.' In a letter dated the 11th, the same correspondent renews and corroborates his statement:—'The fact I mentioned on Thursday about the ships built in the French ports for the service of the Confederates, and then sold to the Prussian Government, is alluded to in the Opinion Nationale. "It is with affliction we learn," it says, "that France has herself undertaken to furnish Prussia with these engines of battle and destruction." It corroborates my statement that several ships of war, "two of which are iron-clad," were built at Nantes and Bordeaux; that the French Government forbade the builder in the most positive manner to deliver them to the parties for whom they were intended; that several (the Opinion says five) have just been bought by the Prussians; and that one of them, the Yeddo, cleared out at Bordeaux for Amsterdam, and reached Bremerhaven, where she hoisted the Prussian flag. The four others will soon follow the same destination. The peculiarity of the case is that the ships were built with the full knowledge and sanction, not to say encouragement, of the Government, which, though it may have subsequently changed its views, was under no necessity to have them sold to Prussia, a belligerent Power.'

'GENERAL GRANT'S LINE.'—The Richmond Enquirer of June 15 says:—'"I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all the summer." These were the words of General Grant when near Spottsylvania Court House. The line from Spottsylvania Court House to Richmond would pass through Spottsylvania, Hanover, and Henrico Counties; but the line he followed passed through Caroline, King William, Hanover, New Kent, and Charles City, to the deep waters of the James River, eighty miles by water and thirty by land from Richmond. His army is at Westover and Harrison's Landing. He tried Hooker's, Burnside's, and M'Clellan's lines, combining all three, and now rests on the James River, at the very spot to which M'Clellan was driven just two years ago. He might have reached his present position by water, without opposition.'

IMPORTS FROM FRANCE.—It appears from a Parliamentary return issued yesterday that the value of the linen manufactures, viz., cambrics and French lawns, damask and damask diaper, sails and sail cloth, &c., imported into the United Kingdom in the year ended May 31, 1863, was 55,934*l.* In the year ended May 31 this year, the total value of the imports was 211,949*l.* The great increase is in linen yarn.

COOKING THE GOOSE.—The Confederate army seems ahead of ours in military improvements, as it appears amply furnished with 'Grant's Cooking Apparatus.'—The Owl.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

The War.

THE most significant item of intelligence from America during the past week has been Mr. STANTON'S silence. Gradually the despatches of the War Secretary have become briefer and more obscure, until at last even the farce of official publication is laid aside, and New York is given over entirely to the 'shaves' and camp rumours of the jobbers. Barely a month has elapsed since the Northern press was loud in its praises of Mr. STANTON'S candour and promptitude. Early publication of news, whether good or bad, was what was required by a high-spirited, confident, and intelligent community; and, up to a certain time, Mr. STANTON endeavoured to deserve the eulogium. But GRANT'S defeats at Petersburg on the 17th and 18th ult. convince the editor of the official despatches that enough had been sacrificed in the interests of truth, and that henceforth a 'golden silence' would be judicious. We are now left, therefore, to newspaper correspondence and camp gossip; and as there is nothing but the news of Federal defeat to recount, perhaps it is as well that we are allowed to glean it from such sources, instead of having it filtered through the bureaux at Washington. It cannot, however, we fancy, be maintained that, from a Northern point of view, no news is good news. The eagerness with which for many months past the Federal authorities have snatched at every little scrap of information which could possibly be put before the public in a favourable light, contrasts ominously with their present tardiness in relieving the suspense of the Northern citizens; and we may be quite certain that when the telegram announces, as the result of three days' later intelligence, that there is no news from GRANT'S or SHERMAN'S force, there is at least nothing of a satisfactory nature to disclose. The turning-point of the campaigns, both in Virginia and Georgia, is now come. It is no longer a question whether GRANT shall capture Richmond this summer and SHERMAN advance his outposts to Atlanta. But it is a question, and a very serious one, for the LINCOLN Administration, whether the Federal army in Virginia is not hopelessly crippled so far as any forward movement is concerned, and whether SHERMAN'S forces are not in imminent peril of destruction. And yet all Mr. STANTON can do at such a crisis is to preserve an 'eloquent' silence—a silence, the mute terror of which proclaims far and wide through the Northern and Western States the failure of their last hope of enslaving the Southern Confederacy.

In our last issue we ventured to anticipate that if GRANT attempted to extend his line by his left, with a view to the semi-investment of Petersburg, he would be severely handled, and the event has justified our remarks. It is now known that GRANT did advance upon the Petersburg and Weldon Railroad, and that the Confederates under General HILL, slipping in between the 2nd and 6th Corps, fell upon the rear of the former, and completely broke it up, capturing and putting hors de combat not less than 5,000 men. This check at once put a stop to any forward movement, and GRANT'S whole army fell back upon its entrenchments on the eastern side of Petersburg. Thus, its extreme left resting on the Petersburg and Norfolk line of railroad, and its right on the City Point line, GRANT'S army occupied the position rather of a besieged than a besieging force, and was obviously far more intent upon securing its own communications than assaulting Petersburg. Indeed, the whole efforts of the Federal General seem to have been directed less to the capture of Richmond than to cavalry raids in Southern Virginia, as if the destruction for 24 or 48 hours of a line of railroad would produce a panic in the Southern capital and compel LEE to retreat. In fact the Daily News is so delighted with GRANT'S 'masterly inactivity' as to found its only hope of ultimate victory on these cavalry raids, and to compare SHERMAN'S critical position in Georgia with that of LEE in Virginia. But the difference is obvious. LEE'S depôt of supplies is Richmond. The town has been supplied for a siege. It contains within its limits all the requirements of a powerful army; it is abundantly provided with water, it has immense ironworks and other manufactories; and if GRANT remained twelve months in his present position, unless he was able permanently to hold the lines of railroad, he might for all practical purposes be drilling his men at Bull Run. How slight the damage he can do to the railroad communications of Richmond must be, is shown by WILSON'S cavalry expedition to the Danville line. This force is reported to have destroyed twenty miles of the road, but on its return is attacked by the Confederates, finds the way back to the Federal camp barred by a strong Southern force, attacks and is beaten, and finally compels GRANT to despatch an army of 30,000 men to its relief. The engagement seems to have taken place at Beam's Station, on the Petersburg and Weldon line, and according to Federal accounts, General WILSON was unable to accomplish his purpose. But the despatch of the Sixth and a portion of the Second Corps will hardly improve the 'situation.' Already we hear that the Confederates are moving in the direction of the Federal rear; and it is quite possible that the attack of General HILL'S corps will be repeated, and that the 30,000 men sent on to extricate the cavalry may also find on their return a strong Confederate force barring the way. Certainly the Federals are very unfortunate in their cavalry expeditions. SHERIDAN failed to reach Gordonsville, or to reinforce HUNTER; and we now hear of his disastrous retreat from West Point to the James River with the admitted loss of upwards of 1,500 men. If WILSON'S cavalry corps meets with similar treatment, the raids of the Federal army in Virginia will speedily come to an end. But, for the moment, the most dangerous enemies of the Northern army in Virginia are the heat and the drought. Men and horses, it is said, are dying by hundreds of the fatigues of a campaign carried on in such weather. Water was not to be had; the ambulances were hard at work all day carrying the sick to the rear; and in the hospitals men were dying in crowds. An army of veterans would become demoralised by these privations, supervening on constant defeat in the field. What can be expected or hoped of the raw troops under GRANT'S command?

And if General GRANT has played or is on the point of playing his last card without the faintest prospect of success, we may say the same of his fellows. HUNTER is said to have escaped with the bulk of his force, but with the loss of thirteen pieces of artillery and large numbers of men. The Confederates are on his track, and it is as yet uncertain that he has been able to reach a place of safety. SHERMAN,' after advancing within twenty-two miles of Atlanta, has come to a halt in front of the Kenesaw Mountains, and after having lost a great battle and some 5,000 men, is reported to be retreating. Generals WHEELER and FORREST are said to be in his rear with powerful cavalry forces; and if the story is true that SHERMAN has already commenced his retreat, it is possible that within a week or two we may hear of the greatest disaster that has yet occurred to the Federal arms. In New York and Washington the 'situation' is beginning to be appreciated. Mr. CHASE'S resignation, when he has plunged the North into illimitable bankruptcy, is six months too late for his reputation and his country; while the fluctuations in the price of gold betoken a state of things that can only precede a grand crash. On the whole, we are inclined to think that within the next fortnight decisive and highly satisfactory news may be expected from both of the great Confederate armies.

Confederate and Federal Credit Abroad.

THE two most marked features in the quotations of foreign stocks for several weeks past have been the rapid yet steady rise in the Confederate Cotton Loan and the correspondingly rapid decline of the United States 'Five-Twenties.' At the same time that the former passed 70 with long strides upwards, the latter were on the descending scale within a step or two of 40. There is in this fact a suggestive contrast to which sufficient heed has not been given, simply because the Federal security, unlike its Confederate rival, does not figure daily in the reports of the Stock Exchange transactions. We here anticipate the plea with which the partisans of the North will doubtless console themselves. They will urge that for the purpose of a fair comparison we should take the domestic or internal debt of the two Governments, and that in such case the contrast would be as unfavourable to the Confederates as it now appears to the Federals. A better plea would be that the Confederate Foreign Loan rests upon a tangible solid basis in the shape of cotton, while the Federal bonds are based upon an unsupported national credit; but the partisans of the North are estopped from pleading this in extenuation of the disparity, since they have persistently and unanimously professed to consider the cotton basis of the Confederate Loan as utterly chimerical. The truth is that though nominally the two securities differ in character, they fulfil all the conditions for a fair and just comparison of the relative credit abroad of their respective issuers.

The United States 'Five-Twenties,' so called because redemption is optional after five years and compulsory in twenty years from date, bearing six per cent. interest, are expressly intended to subserve the purpose of an indirect foreign loan, the direct negotiation, several times attempted, having signally failed. There is a regular machinery for peddling and hawking them about, 'in quantities to suit purchasers,' not merely in the great money marts but among the rural and industrial populations of Europe. In Holland and especially in Germany, where the traditional belief in the fabulous wealth and prosperity of the United States still survives, and where the cause of the North is looked upon as that of a second 'Vaterland,' this machinery has worked most effectively, and the very cheapness of the ubiquitous bonds has tempted imprudent investments. It is believed that an amount vastly greater than that of the whole Confederate Foreign Loan has been thus placed in various Continental countries, and, to a more limited extent, also in Scotland and Ireland. The gold thus drawn, mainly from the hard-earned savings of the poor, has been Mr. CHASE'S chief reliance in his ruinous coup d'état in the New York specie market, and it has contributed to retard the inevitable and long-expected crash. We are fully warranted, therefore, in treating these bonds as to all intents and purposes an appeal to foreign credit, quite as much so as if the loan, instead of being indirectly obtained, had been formally negotiated. On the other hand, it would be most unfair to compare securities so placed with the funded domestic debt of a country where, owing to a blockade by sea and land, the precious metals have been withdrawn from the operation of the laws of supply and demand, and acquired an altogether arbitrary value, as speculative as that of certain bulbs in the famous tulip mania. The bonds of the Confederate funded debt represent a home currency more or less deranged, and measure its fluctuations for better or for worse, but they in nowise represent Confederate credit abroad, for which reason only a very insignificant portion has ever sought its way into the European market.

The Foreign Loan of the Confederate States derives undoubtedly an inestimable strength from its broad substratum of hypotheticated cotton. Thanks to this, it has an invariable standard of its own value, and is wholly independent of, and unaffected by, the capricious price of gold or the redundant issues of treasury notes in the Confederacy. However poor in the precious metals the Southern States may become, or however disordered their internal finances, they will always have, so long as they are their own masters, the means to pay from their accumulated store and their inexhaustible soil in a medium the specie-value of which can never be less than the stipulated minimum of sixpence per pound. But though this fortunate circumstance of a double standard of payment securely shields the foreign debt of the Confederacy from the dangers attaching to its domestic finances, the ability to pay, even when cotton is substituted for gold, depends upon the same condition, that the Confederates should be their own masters; in other words, upon the fortunes of a war of independence—upon the credit of their Government abroad. It is therefore exposed to the same fluctuations, according to the course and tenor of events, as any other national security unsustained by a similar substantial pledge. This becomes still more clear when we consider the history of the Loan from its inception. By far the greater portion was subscribed, and is still held, by persons in the classes removed from commercial or speculative pursuits. Partly perhaps from sympathy, partly from abiding confidence in the ultimate safety of the investment, the most tenacious holders are to be found among the landed gentry of England—purchasers at the issue price, who are content to lock up their bonds and bide their time. It is for this reason that, despite the unusual inducements to speculation, the transactions in the Loan have at all times been confined to moderate limits. In fact, it required an extraordinary accidental depression in the merchantable value of the bonds to bring the 'cotton feature'—that is to say, the reserved strength of their capability of immediate conversion—at all into active play. The enterprise which has been prosecuted with such striking success at Mobile and the Texan ports, of exchanging the bonds for cotton and running the latter through the blockade, did not commence until the bonds, after the failure of General LEE's Pennsylvania campaign, had fallen to the low level now reached by the securities of the United States. Once commenced, success invited continuance, and the prohibitive restrictions of the Confederate Government on foreign commerce, by giving the bondholders a valuable monopoly, imparted a still stronger impulse to this lucrative business, so that now we behold the unprecedented spectacle of an unrecognised Government paying not only the interest but redeeming the capital of its foreign indebtedness while struggling against heavy odds. It would be unfair to ignore the healthy effect which this process is exercising upon the quotations of the bonds on the Stock Exchange; but the fact nevertheless remains that to the aggregate of the holders and the public at large these quotations represent, not the value of cotton nor the profits of blockade-running, but the measure of confidence in the triumph of Confederate arms, just as the merchantable value of United States Government securities in foreign markets represents the measure of still lingering hope, on the part of the adherents of the North, in the ultimate success of its scheme of subjugation and extermination. Both are promises to pay interest and capital in gold, and both are intended for placement abroad.

The only deduction we are called upon to make in contrasting Confederate bonds at 73 with Federals at 41, is that the former pay 7 per cent. interest, the latter promise only 6 per cent. The interest for the former is payable abroad, for the latter at home. These are the only real advantages which, judged from a purely financial point of view, the Confederate bond would intrinsically possess over the Federal bond, if the credit of the two Governments was equal. This will hardly be considered as compensating for the want of recognition, and the tacit encouragement thus given to the aggressor. Fairly tested, then, by the infallible barometer of the money markets of the world, the relative ability of making good a future promise to pay is, in the opinion of the most cautious and sagaciously sensitive class, decided between the two American belligerents to be as 73 is to 41, and this disproportion is still rapidly widening. And yet the statesmen of Europe affect to treat the Confederate States as a part of Mr. LINCOLN's dominions, and the Confederate Government as representing only 'a local insurrection chiefly adjacent to the Gulf of Mexico.'

If, when the loan was three times over subscribed for at 90, the Confederates might point with just pride to that 'financial recognition' which greeted them, in spite of the timidity of Cabinets, and which the ignorance and prejudice in high quarters was impotent to withhold, not less proudly may they indulge in the same reflection to-day, when, after many reverses and disappointments, the mightiest effort of the fury of their aggressors has spent itself in vain, and the financial public of Europe reindorses the verdict passed in the spring of last year. There is no judgment more respected for its usual accuracy and unvarying impartiality than that of the 'City Article' of the Times. Reviewing the transactions in foreign stocks on Saturday evening last, it said, 'The Confederate Loan is at 69 to 71, so that, notwithstanding the unexpected extent to which, during the last three years, the war for the subjugation of the South has been supported by Irish mercenaries and German and Dutch capital, these bonds are now at a price which, reckoning dividends, sinking fund, and allowances provided for meanwhile, would involve little more loss to the original subscribers than that of interest from the date of its introduction.' Of how different is the present and prospective fate of those who trusted—we are charitable enough to assume unwittingly—in the cause of oppression, the same column gives abundant evidence and warning.

The moral which we would draw from the foregoing is one of high encouragement to the South. It is proved that, though political recognition might at an earlier date have saved much blood, and would even now be gratefully accepted, the Confederate States can dispense with the official formula, and do not require the gracious permission of any Foreign Office to exist as a great and mighty Power. They have never abjectly sought that equal intercourse with other nations to which they are by right entitled; neither would they arrogantly repel it; but the time is near at hand when they will be able to select their own associates and on their own terms. With peace they will have little of favour to ask from the rest of the world, other nations much from them; and as there has been no ebullition of temper under bitter disappointment in the hour of adversity, so there will be no vindictiveness, but simple justice, in the hour of triumph. The fiat of the European Governments, ready at a signal from England, might at any time these two years, by the simple word of recognition, have given peace, and may do so now: but recognition will not give political independence, for that the Confederate States have uninterruptedly had since the 18th day of February, 1861; and from that day, when Mr. LINCOLN had not yet ascended the Presidential chair, to this, the Government of Washington has not ruled over a foot of their soil save under cover of a precarious military tenure. Financially, also, the Confederate States are truly independent. No foreign loan would have been incurred, and Congress would not have accepted even the three millions of the five that were offered, had it not been for the belief that the laws of European countries permitted many valuable and necessary purchases to be made, chiefly as regarded the strengthening of the Confederates in coping with their adversaries on the sea. Though no court of law has yet decided that in purchasing ships the Confederates had committed or attempted any infraction of law, the Governments have so shaped their practice, and altered precedents, as to virtually exclude them from these most needed supplies. Thrown in this as in other respects upon their own resources, they have found them sufficient. The bowels of the earth furnish iron; the mechanical skill and ingenuity of a population in which labour is said to be held in contempt have proved adequate; and the result is, that even ironclads may be improvised, the Virginia of Hampton Roads finds a successor in the Albemarle, defeating nine gunboats in the North Carolina waters, and GRANT's fleet is forced to obstruct the James River, in fear of a naval attack from Richmond. It is practicable, therefore, to abandon even the attempt to procure ships from Europe, and this the self-respect of the Confederate Government has already dictated to be definitively done. For whatever other purchases may properly be made in European markets, the funds in Europe are abundantly sufficient; and the meshes in the blockade are wide enough to allow an exportation so vigorous as not only to replace those funds, but also to pay off the debt already incurred. Even the domestic indebtedness need give no uneasiness. A single year's cotton crop will form the basis of a credit in the foreign specie market, comprehensive enough to reduce the Confederate finances into a sound and manageable shape. As for the annual burdens, it will depend upon the wisdom of Confederate statesmen, in the adjustment of export and import duties, to decide what portion Europe shall and can be made to bear.

The West and the War.

WHEN the election of a sectional President on a sectional platform — the successful attempt of a Northern party to establish a government purely Northern on a basis of hostility to the South, and to govern one-half the Union as the vassal of the other—compelled the Southern States to consult their safety and vindicate their independence by withdrawing from a bond whose chief conditions had been openly renounced, and whose essential spirit had been flagrantly outraged by the proceedings of the Republicans, considerable doubt existed as to the course which would probably be pursued by the States of the West. It rested with them to preserve peace, to attempt a compromise, or secure an amicable separation. Without them, war would have been impossible. They alone could give to the Federal Government either the moral strength or the physical force requisite to attempt the coercion of the South. New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, unsupported by the great power of the North-west, would not have dreamed of hostilities. Their population is unwarlike, and their physical force altogether disproportionate to the political influence secured to them by the forms of the Constitution. The issue of peace or war, therefore, depended on the West. And there were many reasons for hoping that the voice of the West would be for peace. It did not hate the South with that venomous animosity which stimulated the people of New England to desire the extermination of eight millions of freemen and the emancipation of four millions of slaves. Its pulpits did not resound with exhortations to perjury in the Senate and murder in the field; it had never embraced with any fervour the doctrines of Abolition, nor had it shared that frenzy of civil strife which, fanned by the sermons of BEECHER and the political harangues of SUMNER, sent a gang of midnight assassins to kindle the flames of servile war on the banks of the Potomac. It is true that there existed in certain parts of the West, and especially among the German settlers, a certain jealousy of the imagined luxury and indolence of 'a slave-holding aristocracy.' It is true that the ignorance of some classes in the West with regard to the real character and social condition of the people of the Cotton States was not much less profound than that of England, and that many of the errors and prejudices so rife in this country three or four years ago were as prevalent in Cincinnati and in Chicago as in London and Liverpool. But the West knew the negro too well to feel any eager zeal for his emancipation. Free negroes were too familiar to the daily experience of Western men to awaken in their bosoms any sentiment of romantic sympathy. In fact, there, as wherever else they abound, they were the objects of aversion and contempt. The citizen of Ohio or Illinois knew that, whatever might be the condition or character of the black man in his normal state of bondage, the day that set him free made him a nuisance and a burden to society; and laws that were the fruit not of prejudice, but of experience, excluded from several of the Western States the fugitives and the freed men of the South. Again, the ties of friendship and of kindred between the South and the West were many and intimate. The majority of the North-western States were formed out of Virginian territory (a fact which ought, by the way, to silence at once all the nonsense we hear about Southern territory won by Northern swords, or paid for by Northern gold. If all were counted, the South has given to the Union far more than she has received from it.) No small proportion of their original population came from the section to which their soil had formerly belonged. And of the 400,000 Southern-born men and women who, in 1860, were settled in the Free States, only a very small proportion were to be found in those of the Atlantic seaboard. It was in the West that Southern settlers were numerous. Again, there was no such antagonism between North-west and South-west as between North-east and South-east. The antipathy between Massachusetts and South Carolina was a strong one; for it was an antipathy of race and of history. The cavaliers of the South naturally despised the Puritans of New England, and were regarded in return with that cold, bitter, unsparing hatred which reminds us that the religion of the Puritan is that of the Jewish judges, not that of Christ and the Apostles. But there was no barrier of race or of feeling between Missouri and Indiana, or between Illinois and Kentucky. On the lakes the Western race might be strongly tinged with Northern blood and feeling; in Mississippi it was deeply mingled with Southern elements; but, except Louisiana, all the Valley of the Mississippi and all the States of the West were settled by a population of much the same character and composition, and claimed a far closer affinity to one another than to the North-east or South-east. There was less difference between Ohio and Kentucky than between Ohio and Pennsylvania, and Arkansas resembled Iowa more closely than Alabama. There was, therefore, no natural hatred between South and West; there were many bonds of mutual kindness; and it required the ingenious villany, by which Mr. LINCOLN and his advisers began the war at unawares, to kindle in the West that flame of unreasoning passion which has desolated a hundred thousand Western homes, and made a desert of the fairest regions of Tennessee and Mississippi.

Once engaged, it was not in the nature of Western men not to fight heartily and fiercely; and the quality of the troops on either side was so evenly matched, that while victory in the Virginian campaigns has always rested with those who had on their side the disadvantage of inferior numbers, but the advantage of courage and discipline, in the West the issue has been decided mainly by superiority of numbers. Southern strategy and the resolution of men fighting for their homes have done much to countervail this advantage; but the superior numbers of the Federal army, composed as it is of men individually equal to their adversaries, have gradually forced back the Confederates from the Cumberland to the borders of Alabama and Georgia. The shameful cowardice, the stupendous failures, the repeated disgraces that have heaped dishonour on the army of the Potomac, have found no parallel in the West, and the States that sent forth the army that carried the Federal flag to Chattanooga have no stain of disaster to cleanse from their escutcheons, no sense of dishonour to embitter their feelings towards the enemy who has fought them with equal courage and with various fortune. And now that the first access of martial ardour is completely over, that the term for which their soldiers enlisted is expiring, that a new levy is demanded, and a Presidential election approaches, the North-western States begin to look more calmly on the past and more deliberately towards the future than is possible to those for whom the past is full of shame and the future of fear. And sounds that by no means soothe the anxieties of New England or rekindle the waning courage of New York begin now to be heard, as citizens of the West ask one another for what they have shed the blood of sons and brothers whom they loved, and laid waste the homes of kindred who, but four years ago, were their good friends and political allies.

When once the West begins to ask such questions of itself, its change of mood is likely to be rapid and complete. For such questions indicate a mood in which passion is giving way to reason, and in which, while men will still consent to fight for an interest or even for an idea, they are on the point of refusing to fight for a name. The honour of the West is not concerned in the prolongation of the war. It has no rout to retrieve; its defeats have been balanced by victories; the only shame with which it has to reproach itself is that its troops have been made the instruments of Yankee ferocity and Yankee greed—have been employed to steal cotton and confiscate plantations for the benefit of New York, and to inflict on defenceless women and children all the indignities and cruelties which could be devised by the cowardly malevolence of New England. To fight for the Union, as they are now learning to believe, is to fight for power to restore the dead to life. Even if the South could be subjugated, the Union could never be renewed; and the subjugation of the South can hardly seem a sure, certainly not an easy, task to the soldiers of Shiloh and Chattanooga. The interests of the West have never been involved in this war; on the contrary, they are, and always have been, substantially identical with those of the South. The West requires nothing but free trade and cheap communication with the outer world. The North has systematically taxed its produce and its consumption for the benefit of manufacturers in New England and merchants in New York. The same system of protection which for thirty years levied an enormous annual tribute on the wealth of the South, for no benefit to the Union at large, but simply for the profit of those Northern brokers who sold her cotton and tobacco, and those Northern manufacturers who excluded European goods that they might receive twice their value for the clothing, the instruments, and the luxuries supplied to her people, has pressed with even greater severity upon the West. Illinois and Indiana, Ohio and Michigan have paid enormous taxes to the corn-factors of the Eastern ports, to the Eastern railroads, to the Eastern manufacturers. Yankee intrigues, and legislation directed to merely Yankee interests, has kept them dependent, and, though failing to keep them poor, has levied blackmail on their wealth. They have no need of the Eastern States. If it should please Providence to turn the six States of New England into an impassable desert, neither the West nor the South—nor anybody else—would be the losers. These States export nothing, and do not even support their own population. Their merchants live on the trade of the South and West; their manufacturers by a tariff which prevents the importation of European goods. A ship canal, rendering the St. Lawrence available for the carriage of Western grain, a treaty with the Confederacy opening that river to Western produce, and a repeal of all customs duties whatsoever, would suffice to render the West perfectly independent of the Eastern States, to put it in direct relations with Europe, to give it fifty per cent. more than it now receives for its exports, and to give it its clothing, agricultural implements, and foreign luxuries at two-thirds of their present prices. Where now it gets $100 it would get $150; where now it spends $150 it would spend $100; and the labour which now brings the Western farmer 100 dollars' worth of clothes, or spades, or coffee and sugar, would then bring him $225. In a word, release from the yoke of New York and New England would more than double the wealth of the Western States. They need but to say the word, and the war must cease, and their trade with the South be renewed. The freedom of the Mississippi is a condition they would not even need to ask, so completely is it accordant with the principles and the interests of the Confederacy. They have but to insist on independence or on free trade, and cheap European goods will replace dear American goods in their markets, and they may have European instead of New York prices for their produce. Is it strange, then, that their wiser and more clear-sighted men should refuse to countenance any longer a policy which rivets on their own limbs the fetters of protection, and binds them to pay a double tribute to those from whom they receive nothing in return? Is it not rather strange that any Western man should be so blind or so bigoted as to wage war on the South for the sake of ruining his best customer and most natural ally; should consent to spend the treasure and the lives which his State can so ill spare, not to restore the Union—for the Union is gone beyond recall—but to restore and perpetuate the dominion of New England over both the South and West? At this hour the West, if her fighting has any intelligible object, is fighting to drive from land which she could not cultivate the men who did, and will hereafter, cultivate it as her political and commercial allies; and fighting for the blessed privilege of paying toll and tribute to support the manufacturers of Lowell and the shoddy dealers of the Empire City.

Two letters are before us in which two distinguished citizens of the West protest against the prolongation of this suicidal folly. Major-General MORGAN, of Ohio, earnestly pleads for an armistice, denouncing in eloquent terms the carnage of the war, and anticipating from negotiation permanent peace and possible reunion. Reunion, as we have said, is neither possible nor desirable: mutual wrongs and antagonistic institutions, honour and policy alike, forbid the South to dream of it; but for peace she has always been eager, and peace will give the West all that she could possibly desire from reunion. The other letter is from Mr. W. M. ANDERSON, a brother of the 'hero' of Fort Sumter. Invited to stand for Congress as a War Democrat, this gentleman indignantly declines the offered honour, and denounces the war in terms befitting a Christian and a patriot. He laments the misery and bloodshed it has caused, the lives sacrificed in a vain and unjust enterprise, and the cruelties which have brought shame upon his country without tending in the least to advance its cause or intimidate its enemies. But he goes further than this—further than any Northern politician has yet ventured to go in public declarations, however many may in their hearts have cherished similar convictions. The Union, he says, is at an end for ever. The Northern section is divided by an antagonism of interests as complete and irreconcilable as that which has parted the South from the North. The West should no longer be the 'political pack-mule' of New England, paying tribute for the support of 'Lowell lords and shoddy ladies,' but assert her right to the proceeds of her own industry, and liberate herself from the yoke of an oppressive tariff. The Western States should secede and form a Western Confederacy, 'peaceably if they may, forcibly if they must.' Such is the advice now openly given by a Western politician, and published in an Ohio journal. If it proves nothing more, it proves at least that the political feeling of the West is sufficiently decided to make it safe for men to say things that would cost them dear if uttered where the authority of Mr. LINCOLN is more obediently recognised; and taken in conjunction with the daring act of Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, in returning home from an exile imposed by sentence of court-martial, and defying the master of five hundred regiments to arrest him again, it argues a growing spirit of resistance which may prove very formidable to a tyranny hitherto relying chiefly on the absence of opposition, and disposed to push its encroachments no further than popular excitement would support or popular passiveness permit them. But it may be that these symptoms of the growth of a new opinion in the West mean more than this. It may be that we shall see that powerful section awaken to a recognition of its real interests, and the absurdity of the part it has hitherto played. If it should be so—if once the West shall be penetrated with a sense of the fact that it has no interest in subduing or in wasting the South, and a very strong interest in resisting and humbling the East—it is not likely that it will consent much longer to fight against its own obvious policy, whether for the name of the Union, the rectification of a frontier, or even from that law of political gravitation which makes nations continue to fight simply because they have begun and do not exactly know how or where to leave off.

Parliament.

BOTH Houses of Parliament were called upon, late on Friday night, to pronounce a verdict upon the conduct of the Administration. In either House a debate of unusual length and animation had called forth the utmost powers of contending statesmen, and the strength of parties was severely tried by the division. It is long since discussions of so much interest, or from which such useful lessons as to the position and prospects of political affairs could be derived, have taken place in Parliament. The orators on each side put forth their utmost powers; the excitement of the hearers lent additional interest and animation to the speeches; and the scene which we witnessed for four nights out of five from the gallery above the SPEAKER'S chair was one of the most deeply interesting that it has ever been our fate to behold.

Mr. DISRAELI'S opening oration had less than usual of the characteristic qualities of the speaker—a peculiarity which arose from the situation in which he was placed, and the necessities of the task he had undertaken. The case for the prosecution must always be opened not by a mere denunciation of the culprit's crime and an outburst of invective against the depth and infamy of his guilt, but by a careful examination of the evidence against him; and if that evidence be, as it was on this occasion, so voluminous as to oblige the orator to occupy a long time in the mere recitation of documentary testimony, and so intricate as to require patient and painstaking analysis, the task of unfolding it with effect is almost incompatible with any high or sustained efforts of eloquence. If Mr. DISRAELI had left to some of his lieutenants the task of opening the debate, and reserved himself for a subsequent period of the evening, when, the case having been fully stated, it would have sufficed for him to comment upon it in its entirety, and to draw a striking picture of the betrayal of Denmark and the humiliation of England, without descending to the details of page and date and the minute verbal criticism required in an opening address, his speech would no doubt have been a much more successful achievement, in a purely artistic sense, and would have been remembered as one of the most brilliant performances of the most effective of Parliamentary satirists. But the difficulties of the opening were such as the Conservative leader probably feared to trust to any less skilful and experienced hand. It was necessary to denounce a policy of cowardice without suggesting a policy of war; to condemn breaches of promise without too forcibly reminding the House that the promises, made on behalf of the nation, would have to be kept in its name; to censure the Administration for betraying Denmark without pledging himself to help her; and to catch at once the votes of those who thought that we never ought to have dreamed of war, and those who chafed impatiently under the burden of an ignominious peace. Mr. DISRAELI probably felt that no one except himself could be trusted to move safely, and yet quickly, among so many pitfalls—to lead a charge at full gallop over a pass where one false step, one swerve to the right or to the left, must be destruction. Mr. FITZGERALD has prudence, but hardly weight enough for the task—General PEEL would have made the motion breathe violently of war, while Lord STANLEY would have made it savour much too strongly of peace at any price. Lord ROBERT CECIL, who showed in a subsequent speech that he could sacrifice all personal crotchets, suppress his own strong individual sympathy for Denmark, and follow steadily the course traced out for him by his leader, might have found temptation too strong for him, if he had been left to give, instead of receiving, the tone of the discussion; and there may be other reasons why the ablest 'junior' among the leaders of Opposition should not be asked to open the case against the Government. It was inevitable, therefore, that Mr. DISRAELI should do this duty himself; and he probably regretted it the less that, as the mover of a substantive resolution, he would by the rules of the House enjoy the right of reply.

He spoke well, calmly, and very clearly—a statesmanlike and demonstrative speech, but not a great success. He sought to show that the desertion of Denmark arose from the helpless blundering of the Administration in the Polish negotiations; and his history of the transaction, which he supported by citing several striking passages from the blue-books, was briefly this: England encouraged France to take a very firm and peremptory line towards Russia, and the two Powers committed themselves very deeply on behalf of Poland. While they were in this cordial union, England took the lead in Danish matters, and promised substantial aid to Denmark, and threatened armed resistance to Germany, in the conviction that she would enjoy the support of France. Then came the Polish fiasco: the scornful defiance of Prince GORTSCHAKOFF revealed to astonished and indignant France the emptiness of Lord RUSSELL'S threats, and explained that all his bellicose despatches only covered a determination on no account to be drawn into so hazardous a thing as a quarrel. The EMPEROR was justly enraged; and the next application of England for aid in the Dano-German quarrel was met by the taunt that France had no mind to get herself kicked by Austria and Prussia, just after Russia had slapped her in the face. England might be used to those rebuffs, and regard them with patience; but France had a different creed, and could not expose herself to a repetition of the affront she had endured from Prince GORTSCHAKOFF. The peremptory and not too courteous refusal of England to support the EMPEROR'S proposition for a Congress still further alienated the French Government, which now made plain, both to Denmark and to us, its resolution to give no assistance in the event of a war between Denmark and Germany. The Government of England, however, continued to threaten Germany and counsel Denmark as if it could still depend on the aid of France, until the moment for action arrived and found us unprepared. From that moment our influence had sunk in Europe, and the Conference and its failure had completed our humiliation.

Mr. Gladstone, who followed Mr. Disraeli, had a very difficult task to perform, and did not perform it well. He lost his temper, and accused Mr. Disraeli of falsifying certain despatches, from which he read only such parts as bore out his assertions. This imputation—for which Mr. Gladstone felt himself at length compelled to apologise — was simply absurd. First, of the supplementary passages added by Mr. Gladstone, only one seemed to modify in any degree the sense of what had been read by Mr. Disraeli. That gentleman had not read the portions of the despatches which softened the effect of what he did read; but the softening was a mere piece of diplomatic courtesy, and the passages quoted were those that gave the real and substantive meaning of the whole. Secondly, as Mr. Disraeli observed in his reply, it is childish to accuse an orator of garbling quotations from papers to which he refers by page and title, which are in the hands of several of his audience, and through which, while he speaks, he sees his adversary following him passage by passage. Then Mr. Gladstone addressed himself, with great ingenuity, to prove that threats were not threats, and that promises were not promises; to explain away this, and modify that; and finally rested in a vague cloud of phrases from which he had diligently discharged all meaning, natural or diplomatic, with the bold assertion that Lord Russell had never given any promise to Denmark—that, if he had, Denmark had forfeited the promise by her delay in fulfilling the conditions—and that England had used no threats to Germany which had not been equally used by France and Russia. In the confusion in which he left the facts, they remained for twenty-four hours, when Lord Robert Cecil took them in hand. The noble Lord spoke on this occasion in a style most unlike his own. He had an admirable theme for scathing sarcasm and indignant declamation, an audience prepared for it, an enemy on whom he delights to lavish it. But he restrained his fiery spirit, and turned his energies not to oratory but to proof. He took up Mr. Gladstone's assertions, and replied to them, blue-book in hand, with an overwhelming mass of documentary evidence. He showed distinct promises to Denmark; he showed that the delay of which Denmark was accused arose from those constitutional necessities to which England had agreed to defer, and for which she had demanded the deference of Germany; and finally he cited a number of very distinct threats addressed to Austria and Prussia—much more emphatic in their language than those which have generally preceded actual war—and challenged the Government to quote any parallel menaces from the despatches of France and Russia. This they totally failed to do; Mr. Layard, who on Thursday night delivered the defence of the Foreign Office, explaining in detail and denying at large in a wild imitation of Mr. Gladstone, but omitting to meet in any way the distinct and specific challenge of Lord Robert Cecil. Altogether, the noble Lord's was the most conclusive speech delivered during the debate, and completely established the important facts alleged against the Administration, viz., that England in a special manner constituted herself the protectress of Denmark; that in that capacity she implicitly promised material aid to her ally, and expressly threatened open hostility to Germany; and that neither threat nor promise was fulfilled.

The case, therefore, was proved; and Mr. Disraeli's vote of censure was justified by abundant evidence of the charge which it conveyed. Nearly every one who spoke on either side, except the Ministers themselves, admitted that the influence of England had been grievously lowered, and lowered by the misconduct of Ministers. If this had been the real issue, it would have been decided by a vote of 500 to 50. But the very form in which the vote was finally put, 'that the words proposed to be left out (the words of censure) stand part of the question,' in itself indicated what was really disputed. Should Parliament pronounce the censure admittedly deserved, and thereby discharge the Government from office? This issue was decided in the negative by the votes represented by Messrs. Cobden, Horsman, and Forster. All those gentlemen spoke in strong and bitter condemnation of what had been done. The two former, especially, were not less severe in their criticism of the Ministerial policy than the Opposition themselves. But they deprived their censure of its practical sting by a determination not to cashier Lord Palmerston in favour of Mr. Disraeli; and a matter in which the honour of the country was deeply involved was finally determined by purely personal considerations. The Radicals voted with Government because they hated the leader of Opposition.

Mr. Cobden's speech embodied very forcibly his peculiar creed. It was a naked avowal of blank political atheism—a denial that power and wealth impose on nations any such obligations as they are universally allowed to impose on individuals—a profession of public selfishness and cowardice, the more revolting to a thoughtful hearer that it was made by a man of undoubted sincerity, whose own political morality is at least as high as that of his neighbours, in a tone of exultant vaticination. Mr. Cobden assumes the tone of a prophet to preach that there is no God. It is not as a cynic, but as an enthusiast, that he proclaims the deification of commerce and teaches the gospel of gain; and while he inculcates upon his country the doctrine that her wealth and strength and authority in the world were given to her, not that she might help to succour the weak and curb the violence of the strong, but simply that she might trade and wax rich, his countenance glows with the ardour of a belief, evidently sincere, that he is doing homage to virtue and service to mankind. After listening to him, it is easy to understand how there come to be bigots in the darkest unbelief, and atheism itself can boast its martyrs.

Thursday evening witnessed a discreditable scene in the House of Commons. Mr. Layard charged the Opposition with 'falsification.' Mr. Gathorne Hardy retorted with the imputation of 'calumny.' The Speaker ruled that the retort was Parliamentary; and then sprang up Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone, setting the Speaker at nought, and angrily hooted by the Opposition. Mr. Disraeli interposed, and pointed out that if gentlemen were to be accused of falsehood, they could hardly describe the accusation as anything but a calumny; and moreover reminded the House that the original offender had been Mr. Gladstone, whom Mr. Layard had merely quoted. Next evening Mr. Gladstone made a graceful and frank apology. Meantime Mr. Hennessy excited much mirth by producing a speech of 1855, in which Lord Palmerston had denounced as calumnies certain charges preferred by his present Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

The debate was concluded with three speeches, all noteworthy for different reasons. Mr. Walpole, who is no great orator, but speaks with the force of a high character and a sincerity superior to all purely party considerations, delivered an emphatic declaration of his sympathy with the resolution and his disapproval of the Ministry; and in so doing he showed that the Conservative party were fighting a battle in which their hearts were engaged. In a mere Parliamentary manœuvre, Mr. Walpole is never prominent. Lord Palmerston astounded the House by unusual feebleness. When he came to sum up, in his hesitating way, all the progress made by England under his Ministry—delivering, in fact, a very bad repetition of the least interesting part of the last Budget speech—it required all his popularity and all the dignity of his age and office to keep the impatience and astonishment of the House within bounds. Mr. Disraeli spoke with unusual calmness and good temper, civilly of Mr. Gladstone, and not unkindly even of Lord Russell.

The result was inevitable. The fatal weakness of the Conservative case had been evinced at an early period in the debate, and in two of the best speeches on their side. General Peel, in a speech of great energy, but somewhat wanting in discretion and statesmanship, had censured the Government because they had not kept their promise to fight for Denmark. Lord Stanley, more wise than chivalrous, declared that it would be insanity to go to war with Germany, and blamed the Government only for promising to do so. The Conservatives, therefore, had no affirmative to propose; they could say that the Government had done wrong, but they would not say what it would have been right to do; and a motion of this imperfect kind will never compel the adhesion of reluctant votes, though it may serve the purpose of a party which can command a majority of its own. The Liberals refused, for the sake of punishing Lord Russell, to put Mr. Disraeli in office; and, though the country would have compelled some of them to do this if Mr. Disraeli had shown it a way out of the scrape, it is very indifferent to the mere infliction of judgment for the past. Some Conservatives, too, as generally happens to all parties when making a rush for office, deserted their leader; some were ill, one or two were disloyal; and the result was a Government majority of 18 in a House of 608.

The House of Lords gave Lord Malmesbury, who moved a similar vote of censure, a majority of 9 in a House of about 350. In the absence of Lord Derby, the debate in the Upper House was less interesting than that in the Commons. It was marked, however, by a very statesmanlike speech from Lord Grey, who reviewed the policy of the Administration in Poland and in Denmark with the authority which belongs to one who, after enjoying the advantage of Ministerial experience, has for years been virtually independent of all party ties, and able to speak with the dignity and impartiality of a judge rather than with the vehemence and ingenuity of an advocate. He pointed out that it was in our power, before German troops crossed the Eider, to have made the invasion of Denmark impossible, and probably to have prevented the attempt. And he expressed his opinion distinctly in favour of that course; which, no doubt, would have saved our honour and the independence of our ally, and which probably would not have cost a war. It is satisfactory to obtain this one suggestion of positive statesmanship in the midst of scores of columns of merely negative criticism. Lord Carnarvon's speech was worthy of the rising reputation of a nobleman who may one day hold a leading position in the country; and Lord Clarendon's also was frank, lucid, and eloquent beyond what was expected from an orator who has long been silent in the House. Lord Russell did not vindicate himself much more successfully than did his colleagues in the other House, and neither Lord Malmesbury and Lord Chelmsford on the one hand, nor the Duke of Argyll and Earl Granville on the other, atoned for the absence of the one great orator of the House of Peers.

The defeat of the Conservatives, with so good a case in their hands, shows that Lord Palmerston is master of the situation in the present Parliament; that the Radical malcontents, keeping Italy and America in mind, had rather not overthrow him in favour of Lord Derby, and, while they bark from time to time, will take care never to bite too severely. On the other hand, the uncertainty which for some time prevailed, and the tone of the speeches, indicate that there is no pressure from without in favour of the Ministry; no such feeling on their behalf in the constituencies as would save them from the consequences of offending Parliament, or make them very secure of success if they should be hurried into an 'appeal to the country.' A serious failure, an unpopular error, an outrage patiently endured, might in the present even balance of parties cost the Liberals dear. The Tories are in better spirits and discipline than they have been since 1846; and a general election under circumstances unfavourable to the Whigs might put them into power, with a decent majority and the prospect of a long lease of office.

Governor Seymour's letter on the suppression of the World and Journal of Commerce:—'Executive Chamber, Albany, June 25, 1864. A. Oakey Hall, Esq., District Attorney of the City and County of New York.—Sir: In the matter of the seizure of the offices of the World and Journal of Commerce, the Grand Jury, in disregard of their oaths "to diligently inquire into and true presentment make of all such matters and things as should be given them in charge," have refused to make such enquiries, and declare that "it is inexpedient to examine into the subject referred to in the charges of the Court," with respect to such seizures. It becomes my duty, under the express requirements of the Constitution, "to take care that the laws of the State are faithfully executed." If the Grand Jury, in pursuance of the demands of the law and the obligation of their oaths, had inquired into the matter given them in charge by the Court and the public prosecutor, their decision, whatever it might have been, would have been entitled to respect. As they have refused to do their duty, the subject of the seizure of these journals should at once be brought before some proper magistrate. If you wish any assistance in the prosecution of these investigations it will be given to you. As it is a matter of public interest that violations of the laws of the State be punished, the views or wishes of the parties immediately affected must not be suffered to influence the action of public officers. If through fear or other motives they are unwilling to aid you in getting at facts, it will be your duty to compel their attendance as witnesses in behalf of the people. Respectfully yours, Horatio Seymour.'

A Northern View of European Mediation.—The Boston Courier of June 28 has an article on the recruiting of the Northern army with British subjects, which, it says, cannot be agreeable to England. The article concludes with the following passage, which, not a year ago, would have induced Mr. Seward to ring one of his bells and commit the editor to prison:—'Should the campaigns in progress result in no decisive advantage to the North, will our people be so unwilling as before to listen to the powerful arguments which England and France are able to put forward in favour of peace? We do not believe that they will. England having thus a stronger reason than ever for desiring peace, France joining her, and our own people brought at last to a frame of mind disposing them to listen to the mediation of those great Powers, may we not expect some such more speedy conclusion of the war than many have looked for?'

Is Mr. Lincoln a Buffoon?—The New York World of June 17 has a leader upon Mr. Lincoln's buffoonery. After numerous proofs of the truth of the charge, the article thus continues: 'We appeal to the staff-officers who galloped behind the President when he visited the battle-field of Antietam, and who increased their distance from him rather than listen longer to the low nigger song of "Picayune Butler," which Mr. Lincoln called on Marshal Lamon to sing, as he rode among the fresh graves and trenches where were buried the ten thousand dead soldiers of the Republic.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK: June 27, 1864.

A LINCOLNITE ORGAN ON THE WAR—THE OBJECT OF IT IS CONQUEST, AND IT CAN ONLY BE CONCLUDED BY EXHAUSTION—THE NORTHERN WANT OF MEN AND MONEY—THE SOUTH IS BETTER OFF—THE COMMUTATION CLAUSE—THE PLEA OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—THE PEACE PARTY AND ITS PROSPECTS—THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE NORTH—THE PUBLIC DEBT—THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN A 'MUDDLE.'

THE Times of this city contained, on Saturday, a very remarkable article. It is entitled, 'Which shall give way first?' Its aim is to show that there is no possible end to this war but in the inability of one or the other of the belligerents to carry it on any longer. The reasoning is, that there is a positive limit beyond which it cannot go at the present rate of sacrifices, and that the only question is, which will be first exhausted? It is so just and so discerning as to say that, with the South, the only element to be considered is whether they can find men. The question of finance is secondary; they have thrown all their resources, public and private, into the cause, and so long as the supply of men lasts the South will find means to support them, and the war will last. With the North the elements are two. The North needs the men and the money to get the men. 'It is settled,' says the Times, 'that the South can and will get along without money, and that the North cannot and will not.' The testimony of the Times is, that the men of the South will fight without pay or reward or hope of profit, for the love of the cause. The war can only be ended by exhausting the Southern country of its defenders, overwhelming them by superior masses who fight for their wages. It is confessed to be a war of mercenaries, of whom the boast is made that enough can be had as long as the money lasts, against a unanimous people who are only to be subjugated by being exterminated. The Times is the only original supporter among the New York City journals of the renomination of Mr. Lincoln. Its editor, H. J. Raymond, is, more than any other journalist, the reflex of the views of the Administration party. He is the chairman of the National Executive Committee appointed by the Baltimore Convention for the Presidential campaign; his testimony, therefore, to the true character of the war, has the force of that of a trusted friend and organ of the party of the Administration. It contains the shocking confession that the North and the South have become so furiously and irreconcilably hostile to each other that they can never be brought together under one Government except as master and subject; and it makes the audacious avowal that the design to subjugate an unwilling people is to be persisted in until the capacity for resistance is destroyed by the exhausting of the arms-bearing population. The Times and its party think there will be no peace until the men of this generation of the South are slaughtered. The calculation does not go so far as to predict what sort of a peace it will be, or how it can be enforced against coming generations, who will grow up to remember who murdered their kindred and despoiled them of their inheritance.

But, happily for the cause of justice, and liberty, and humanity, the proposition of the Times, on which it counts for a final success, that there are sacrifices 'which no human power can stand indefinitely,' is as true of the North as of the South. The sacrifices a gallant people will make for the maintenance of independence—to save themselves from dishonour, their territory from devastation, and their homes from pollution—are of another class, and infinitely greater, than those which stimulate an invader to prosecute a costly and doubtful war for conquest and plunder. The Times unwittingly acknowledges the mighty moral powers of endurance which that position confers when it treats the want of men, in the exhaustion of a long war, as the only want which will be fatal to the South. The Southern soldiers do not fight for pay, and finance is but a secondary care of the Government. Their armies are content with bare and scanty subsistence. The whole people work for and share with each other, holding every sacrifice cheap which helps to win their liberty. But the North wants men, and money with which to get men; and, moreover, if they had the money, the time has come in which lavish pay and large bounties will not get men, and the Government avows that, without the power to employ force to fill up the armies, the war must stop for want of men.

There are many signs that the sacrifices of 'money and men' which the prosecution of this war has entailed upon the North already, with so little approach towards a victory that will bring peace, are wearying the people and alarming the Government. On the simple test which the Administration presents, that the North can hold out in money and men longer than the South can supply men for her armies, the omens are to-day largely against the North. The Southern armies are full. Since the beginning of the Grant campaign, in which the North relied on decisive victories, after enormous preparations and a mighty series of gigantic combinations which were expected suddenly to overwhelm and disperse the armies of Lee and Johnston and seize the Confederate capital, there has been an uninterrupted series of checks and repulses which have baffled all the hopes of the North for success without another campaign and large accession of forces; and disappointment in their military leaders is creating a wide-spread wish for another change of commanders, in the barren hope that the right man may be found at last. Six weeks' trial of General Grant has gone far to prove that he is a failure as completely as Pope, Burnside, or Hooker was—only that each side has had a political use for nursing his military reputation and sparing him the denunciations with which one part pursued M'Clellan and the other part assailed M'Clellan's successors for precisely the same acts, which now become strategy because their motive is concealed and their effects do not appear.

The debate on the new Conscription Bill which is before Congress shows the working of these discouraging enactments on the temper of Congress and the Administration. The question before both Houses is, whether the present law shall be so amended as to strike out the commutation clause. By that clause a drafted man liable to military duty might obtain exemption from service by paying $300, and the Government assumed the duty of providing a substitute if it were needed. Rich men bought themselves off; and States, cities, and counties raised enormous sums for the purpose of buying off the poor by paying the commutation fee, or averting the draft by hiring volunteers by large bounties. It is now stated, on behalf of the Administration, that another draft is necessary, and that neither volunteering, nor the system of hiring soldiers by large bounties, nor a conscription with the privilege of purchasing exemption, will supply men enough to fill up the army. The President and the Secretary of War have both urged upon Congress the repeal of the commutation clause, and the making of the draft compulsory on every drafted man. He must serve, or supply an accepted substitute who has escaped the drafting. The ground for this application is, that peremptory conscription only will obtain recruits. The confession is a humiliating one—but it is made under the urgent plea of an immediate necessity—that the wealthy North, with twice the population of the South, starting with resources believed to be boundless and credit absolutely unlimited, and with a fury for conquest which seemed irrepressible, is now, in the fourth year of the war, unable to find soldiers who will fight willingly for the sake of the cause, or to bid high enough to bribe even mercenaries enough to execute its will, and is hunting for power to drag reluctant conscripts pitilessly into the battle-field. The pressure of the necessity which extorts these avowals is found in the disheartening aspect of military affairs, notwithstanding the extraordinary exertions made in preparation for this campaign. Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee of military affairs in the Senate, said in the debate on this subject, 'Since October 17, we have put seven hundred thousand men into the field.' This is in addition to the numbers surviving of the million previously called for. For these men Government has paid $125,000,000 in bounties, besides the sums expended in aid of the recruiting, at the same time, by States and citizens. A new draft is now called for as urgent and unavoidable, and the President, and the War Department, and the friends of Government in both Houses, and its special military organ in the House, say that the men cannot be had unless the law is so amended to their purpose as to make it impossible for the conscripted to escape forced service. A vote was one day cast in the House adverse to this proposition, upon which one of the friends of the Administration in the military committee declared that it was substantially a vote to stop the war. The House was evidently alarmed at its own action, and shows signs of reversing its opinion and gratifying the Government. The Senate was at first of the adverse opinion, and voted down the repealing clause, but the importunities of the Government have prevailed there also, and their action is counted upon in favour of the repeal. The point is still unsettled. A considerable portion of the Republicans are afraid of the effect on the coming elections of the coercive measures which will be required to put a rigid drafting into operation against the popular repugnance to the service, aggravated by the party charges hurled against the Administration by its adversaries, that, by repealing commutation and permitting substitutes, the men of property can still buy themselves off, while the poor man is held beyond the chance of escape. The Republicans are therefore divided on the question, chiefly on political grounds. The Opposition are nearly unanimous against it on several grounds, among which the effect on elections is not the least important. A military necessity and Administration importunity may still carry the Bill, on the calculation that the military success which it may accomplish will enable the party to recover ground with the people. If it fail, the war may be forced to stop now, by the Northern exhaustion of men. Such is the despairing plea which the Government puts in to obtain its measure. But, whether it succeed or not, here is the record made for the instruction of the world by the Government of the North, that its supplies of voluntary soldiers are exhausted, that its means are inadequate to purchase mercenaries at home or abroad, and that force only can fill up its armies to the requirements of the war against the South.

I do not enlarge upon the considerations lately pressed upon the Government by considerate men in its own ranks, that the demands already made upon the vital resources of the North in the abstraction from its labouring force of two millions of men, of whom a million will never return to their work, have already reached the utmost point which the industry of the country can bear without danger of fatal collapse. Those considerations have their insensible effect on public opinion in other ways besides abating the willingness to take an active part in the war. They make, however, part of the case to show that on the part of the North there are great and growing signs of rapid exhaustion in the 'vital resource' of men—not merely of men, for they have none such, like the soldiers of the South, who give themselves up unreservedly in their lives and their fortunes, all they have and all they hope for, to the cause of their country, but even of men who do not make hard bargains for unwilling service, and who do not think it a sacrifice to serve at all, or do not serve against their will.

There is a more outspoken sign of the excessive growth of this anti-war feeling, telling in the repugnance to the army, in the rapid spread of a positive peace party, throughout the country. This feeling, long overawed by the arbitrary will of the Administration, the furious clamouring of its adherents, and the popular enthusiasm for a coming triumph which has never come, has taken of late, ever since the delivery of the great rallying speech of Mr. Long of Ohio, a form and consistency which is making for a peace party a position as a power in the State. The postponing of the Democratic Convention at Chicago from July 4 to August 27 is a victory of the peace elements of the Democratic party over the managing politicians who were in haste to make the nomination of a war Democrat, and had their candidate ready, and apparently sure of the nomination, in General M'Clellan. There is a hope now felt that the events which are transpiring will, by the end of that period, clear the way so that the Chicago Convention may be controlled by public opinion in the interests of peace, and that it will array the great Democratic organisation against the continuance of the war, and against every attempt to restore union except by peaceful negotiation and with the renewed assent of the States to a Government in which they are willing to live. It is but a hope, to which consistency is given by the gloomy condition of public affairs, which is beginning to disturb the public mind with the dread that continued war is financial and political ruin, and by the revolt among the partisans of the Administration in so many quarters, who are putting forth as the present paramount duty of the times the effort to restore civil liberty at home. I lay no present hope for the termination of the war on the direct influence of these movements upon the action of the party or its success, if so directed; but there is great force in their bearings on the question, how long the North will continue to supply men, and at what probable period the absolute dearth of men will constrain the North to surrender the hope of conquering the South. There is a great obstructive power in the Administration; but there is a danger ahead upon which the friends of peace make a strong calculation. They may not be willing to risk the revolutionary disorders which are so likely to follow a series of public calamities that are encountered and created by persistence in obstinate opposition to a decided public opinion. These are elements to be taken into the calculation when we apply the Administration rule as I have quoted it, that the party in this strife who holds out longest must win. In the qualities of steadfastness and endurance, the South has to-day largely the advantage.

The money aspect of the case is growing still more gloomy to the North. When I wrote you on Tuesday last, the official report of the state of the United States Treasury for June had not reached New York. It has since been published. The sum of the public debt on June 14 is reported to be $1,719,395,138 88, of which there are:—

	Principal.	Interest.
Bearing interest in coin	$837,941,091 80	$50,823,672 45
„ „ currency	379,700,802 58	20,876,657 70
	$1,217,641,894 38	$71,699,730 15
Debt, without interest .	501,753,364 50
	1,719,395,158 88

I do not intend to waste attention upon the manipulations by which this aggregate is made in the Administration journals to represent fairly the cost of conducting the war thus far, and to be the basis of an estimate of the cost of continuing it. The $1,700,000,000 represents ascertained and adjusted debt incurred in a different condition of currency, the greater part when prices ruled much lower than they have been under the inflations of the past year, and are likely to continue to be under the Secretary's necessities for continuing to pour out irredeemable paper. There are suspended accounts and claims, of which the payment cannot be resisted, which would swell this sum by hundreds of millions of dollars. But the present amount and ultimate aggregate to which this debt may reach are only elements in the present question of what is the financial credit of the Government, and how long it can continue to get money on the terms to which it is obliged in its present discredit to submit.

Gold has lately been buying the promissory notes of the United States two for one, or at less than 50 cents on the dollar—a little over 48 cents. The Government 5-20's, six per cent. bonds payable after three years and before twenty, are selling at about $105 in currency, which gives a present interest in fact of twelve per cent., with the principal repayable in gold, that is $100 in gold for $105 in paper—a part of the contract of which the exact value can only be known when the loan is repayable, and the Government is disposed and ready to settle.

A short time ago the Government, in its needs, attempted to borrow $75,000,000 at six per cent. interest, payable in gold in seventeen years. It could not obtain offers for the whole amount at any rates. It received such offers as were made at 104 and upwards, averaging 105, which was at about twelve per cent. for the current interest, with the expectation of getting coin at the end for paper, which may be double or treble the amount loaned in currency. A Government which invites loans, and submits to such usurious terms, is on the high road to financial ruin. No man can say, with any confidence in his own prophecy, what its promises to pay may be worth three months hence, and there are no signs of financial success in any measure for reducing the immense volume of the circulation which debases the currency, or providing adequate means for meeting the expenditures which expand with the currency, without repeating the very measures which have proved so destructive. The Secretary is in a muddle, Congress is in a muddle, and the inevitable tendency of all the measures the Secretary recommends, or is constrained to use, is to increase the disorders of which no end is possible but bankruptcy. The result of these things was expressed by a war journal in this city a couple of days ago, in which it was said that without immediate reform in the measures of the Secretary, and immediate improvement in the condition of the currency, one of two things must speedily happen—the repudiation of the public debt, or the abandonment of the war. I am not persuaded that the two things will not happen together, but I am sure that the disorders of the finances are irreparable, and that the second condition of the failure of the North—its exhaustion of money as well as men, and of men certainly when money fails—will come before the South shall have wearied of opposing unflinching resistance, or exhausted its capacity to find means enough to support its independence.

DEATH OF 'MANHATTAN.'

THE well-known New York correspondent of the Herald and Standard, whose letters have been read for nearly three years with unflagging interest, died suddenly on June 25, while President Lincoln was deliberating whether he should be imprisoned in Fort Lafayette or banished to the Confederate States. It is not improbable that the excitement caused by his arrest, and anxiety for the fate of his wife and only child, a daughter whom he tenderly loved, may have produced this fatal catastrophe.

JOSEPH A. SCOVILLE, known here as 'Manhattan,' and in America by the nom de plume of 'Walter Barrett, Clerk,' was born in Connecticut in 1811, and bred to commercial pursuits in one of the largest shipping houses of New York. At the close of his apprenticeship he formed a partnership with another young New Englander, under the title of Scoville & Britton, and embarked adventurously in foreign commerce. Their ships had made but few voyages when a commercial crisis, such as America has been periodically subjected to, caused the failure of the young firm, and Mr. Scoville resorted to literature and politics. He was connected with several papers as publisher or contributor, and, though wanting in education, his extensive acquaintance with men, travel, retentive memory, and impulsiveness of character, made him an interesting writer. Though dealing largely in broad humour, persiflage, and exaggeration, he was at times profound, eloquent, and even poetical, in feeling and expression. Mr. Scoville was a State Rights Democrat; for some years the amanuensis or private secretary of the greatest American statesman of his day, John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina. There could be no better testimony to the real worth of his character than the fact that he was trusted and loved by such a man. He wrote some of Mr. Calhoun's latest works at his dictation, and was with him until his death. He afterwards married a relative of the deceased statesman.

With such a political education and associations, he could not be otherwise than a friend of the South. He had no expression strong enough for the contempt he felt for the Republican party and its proper chief, Abraham Lincoln, and the corrupt crew gorged upon the spoils of war and the plunder of the Northern people. If he professed to be a Union man, he did not hesitate to say that he preferred Jefferson Davis to Abraham Lincoln as the President of the Union. If in his letters he reflected the hopes of the North and the feeling around him, it was never difficult to read his own feelings; and reckless as he has sometimes seemed in his statements, his letters have been on the whole more truthful than Federal despatches. Some allowance must be made for his position. He could not say what he wished, nor serve openly the cause he had at heart, but he managed while he lived, in spite of Federal tyranny, and with Fort Lafayette in sight, to do that cause good service.

Mr. Scoville was generous to a fault. No man ever asked his aid in vain if he had power to help him. He had known misfortune and poverty, and sympathised with the distressed. His good qualities had made him many friends. For two years before his death he held the honourable appointment of reader to the Common Council of New York; and it was a matter of considerable doubt whether President Lincoln, even at the instance of General Dix, and after a full examination of the reasonable correspondence of 'Manhattan,' would have cared to put that body to the trouble of selecting a new reader.

We have no disposition to ignore the literary faults of the letters of 'Manhattan' and the author of 'Marion;' but it is proper, when his energetic labours have been brought to a sudden close by the hand of death, that we should give him credit for his merits and virtues.

BRIGADIER-GEN. ALBERT G. JENKINS, OF THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

When this man died on the field of his final battle, he did not require the hand of partial friendship to record his name in the annals of the war. Along the whole western frontier of his native State, Virginia, his name is a household word; and, like the dead body of the indomitable English monarch, still carried at the head of his columns against the enemy, the name of the young Virginian soldier, whom living they followed so often, has still a leadership for the men of the border against the invader. The incidents of his career, often approaching the romantic, will long be the theme of song and the material of story in the mountains of Virginia, where love for him is a passion; and in the simple traditions of the border, he will always be actor or hero.

For him there will be little conventional grief, stirred by art or oratory—the transient sympathy which men accord to leaders conspicuous in place or power—but in many a lonely home in the seclusion of the Virginian mountains there will be for him tears and grief, and afterwards perpetual preservation of his memory. To these men he was as a chieftain to his clan; and, without depreciation of the noble soldiers and patriots of that region, his loss is irreparable, and he leaves no successor.

When almost a boy, fresh from school and the study of his profession of the law, the threatened struggle of a people in South America against the despotism of their rulers attracted him from position and fortune at home to dare climate and danger in the aid of their cause; and although the occasion he coveted did not occur, yet the unselfish and enthusiastic espousal of the cause of the weak against the strong was early augury of the character and career of the man. Afterwards, when at the age of twenty-five he represented a district on the western border of Virginia in the Federal Congress, he was, with Mason and Hunter and other elder and more conspicuous leaders, the fearless champion of the equality of the Southern States in the territories and of their autonomy at home, then violently assailed by the more populous North. When the election of Mr. Lincoln gave to the aggressive faction at the North the power to achieve their designs, with a promptness almost like prematurity he organised, and armed, and led his neighbours in a resistance which has made a memorable and almost marvellous story for every river, and mountain, and valley of the border.

Early in the war he was made a brigadier-general of an independent brigade of cavalry which he had raised by his influence in that amphibious border-land where the power of the North had overcome the authority of Virginia. These men, controlled as much by his congenial influence as by discipline, he led, rather than commanded, on many a march and foray and raid and field—in many a surprise at midnight and escape by morning—always blinding the foe he struck, with success so invariable, that his enemy ascribed to infallible fortune what his friends knew was the fair result of his daring and inventive military genius. But, defying danger once too often, he died on his last field in a way as knightly as he lived, and wishing to defer death only to do more of his duty.

It seems almost inconsistent to say that a soldier of so intense a type was the gentlest and kindest of men; but it must be forgiven in one who loved him to think that these qualities in the composition of his character made its harmony and symmetry more complete. If in the fervent way he loved his friends, in his versatility and attraction of conversation and manner, there was something almost feminine, still the graces which beautified his character did not mar its strength. His character and deeds contradict the inference drawn from his refinement, just as the most brilliant flowers are borne on the sturdy stems of forest trees in the tropics, although such flowers are oftenest borne by the shrub or the vine. These generous qualities and this gentle refinement shed such lustre on his errors, as half to redeem them and half to blind one to their existence.

These desultory sentences, which must end before the subject is complete, may as well end here. Grief for his loss arrests the record. Hereafter he will be remembered as well as he was loved. H. F.

BRITISH ATROCITY.—If anything more than usually un-English in spirit, and more than usually damaging to English character, is found in our worst of Anglo-Federal contemporaries, we may be sure of the author. It was, therefore, scarcely worth Professor Goldwin Smith's while to append his name in full to the following, which we find in the Daily News of July 11th under the singular misnomer of 'Federal Cruelties':—'In our last war with America, only fifty years ago, Sir Charles Napier witnessed the sack of Little Hampton by the British, and he states that on that occasion "every horror was perpetrated with impunity—rape, murder, pillage—and not a man was punished." Further on, in his diary of the same war, he says:—"Strong is my dislike to what is perhaps a necessary part of our job—viz., plundering and ruining the peasantry. We drive all their cattle, and of course ruin them. My hands are clean; but it is hateful to see the poor Yankees robbed, and to be the robber."'

GENERAL GRANT IN BATTLE.—A correspondent of the New York Times writes:—'I was near General Grant during that terrible Friday (June 3) in the Wilderness. To all outward appearance he was cool, calm, and unoccupied. The skin is so drawn over his forehead that wrinkles there do not show when he is perplexed, and his beard so hides his mouth that no nervousness there betrays his thought. So he sat and whittled, cutting away at his stick with leisurely, measured, meditative strokes much of the time, but turning his knife and cutting at the end nearest himself with short, clipping strokes whenever word came of important changes in the chances of battle. Thus he fought the great contest with knife and stick, and,' adds the writer, giving the reins to his fancy, 'when the stick was gone the enemy was beaten.'

STORNOWAY.—July 4: The total number of bales of cotton shipped in the Labuan (s-s), from Liverpool for Narva, wrecked near this place, was 1,800, of which about 1,100 have been landed in a sound state. The ship broke in two, and the after part sunk in deep water. The remaining 700 bales went down with part of the ship, and about 250 of them have been picked up and brought in here. It is probable that most of the 450 bales still missing will turn up when the vessel is completely broken up. It is understood that the value of the ship and cargo is little short of 80,000*l.*, and they are likely insured to the extent.

CLYDE.—July 7: The Flamingo (steamer), for Bermuda. The Ailsa (steamer), for Bermuda.—July 13: The Elizabeth, for Demerara. The Norton, for St. John's.

GREENOCK.—July 7: The Lafayette (steamer), built by Messrs. AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The Bank rate of discount still remains at 6 per cent.; but notwithstanding that money is abundant and easy in all quantities, it is not anticipated that any further reduction will be made at present. The dividends are now in course of payment, but the reimbursements made to the Bank for advances have not been so large as usual. There is a good supply of paper in the market, particularly foreign bills; but at the same time the deposits for the country are large, which enables the brokers to meet all demands for discount, and for which they are now changing from 5½ to 5¾ per cent. The Joint Stock Banks are more freely disposing of their ample resources at 5½ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money is also very plentiful, and short loans are currently negotiated at 3 per cent. and although the half-monthly settlement in foreign stocks and railway and miscellaneous shares is in progress, the demand is not at all pressing, and there is no expectation that any material augmentation in the ordinary rates will take place.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market has been remarkably quiet during the week, but on the whole the operations have not been of such a favourable character as for the previous two or three weeks, inasmuch as there has not been any specie sent into the Bank, whilst there has been a withdrawal of 25,000*l.* for transmission to the Brazils. The arrivals of specie have been rather more limited than usual, amounting to only 249,688*l.*, of which 204,180*l.* was from New York, 33,600*l.* from Alexandria, and 11,908*l.* from the West Coast of Africa. The West India steamer took out for the Brazils 33,000*l.*, of which 25,000*l.* was in gold and 8,000*l.* silver. The silver market remains very inactive. There are but few orders on hand; at the same time, there is very little silver to meet any demand that may arise from the letters just arrived from India. The quotations for bar silver, $61\frac{1}{8}$d. to $61\frac{1}{4}$d. per oz. There are very few Mexican dollars in the market at present, and the quotation for them must be called $64\frac{1}{2}$d. per oz. As the West India Mail is just telegraphed, there will in all probability be a better supply in a day or two.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

There has been uniform steadiness in the English stock market throughout the greater part of the week, and business has been tolerably active; but to-day, particularly in the later hours, a much better feeling has pervaded all the departments, on the general belief that the Germano-Danish war is about drawing to a close. And the English funds have advanced accordingly, consols closing at $90\frac{3}{8}$ to $90\frac{1}{2}$ ex. div. for money, and $90\frac{3}{4}$ to $90\frac{7}{8}$ ex. div. for the account in August, which shows an improvement of about $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. over the prices of this day week. Exchequer Bills do not exhibit any alteration, the March issue at 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis., and those of June at 5*s.* dis. to par. The Foreign stock market has not been so brisk, the dealers to some extent having still been restricted in their operations through the unsettled state of Continental politics, and prices in consequence have shown a tendency to further depression. Greek stock has receded 1 per cent., being now down to $24\frac{1}{4}$ to $24\frac{3}{4}$; Mexican is $28\frac{1}{2}$ to 29, being $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. declined. Spanish Passives are $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. lower, and the Certificates $\frac{1}{4}$, the former closing at $28\frac{3}{8}$ to $28\frac{3}{4}$, and the latter at $9\frac{7}{8}$ to $10\frac{1}{8}$; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 are steady at $90\frac{1}{2}$ to $91\frac{1}{2}$; but those of 1862 have fallen $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., the price being $68\frac{3}{4}$ to $69\frac{1}{4}$ ex. div.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

This security continues to rise in value upon large purchases effected during the week. The quotations to-day have reached 73 to 75, and stock for delivery appears to be very scarce.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities continues exceedingly flat as regards business, and even more so with respect to prices. There was yesterday a slightly increased animation in one or two stocks, consequent upon the report of the resignation of Mr. Chase, but it had not the effect of improving quotations, and to-day only one transaction has been officially recorded. The dealings during the week comprised Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvanian section. at $73\frac{1}{2}$ and 74. Erie $100 shares, all paid, 49. Illinois Central, Six per cents. at 74. Ditto, $100 shares, $90 paid, at $38\frac{1}{2}$, $42\frac{1}{2}$, 43, 42, $40\frac{1}{2}$, and $41\frac{1}{2}$ dis., and ditto, all paid, at 53, $53\frac{3}{4}$, and $52\frac{1}{2}$.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The British Railway Share Market has been moderately active during the week, and for most descriptions prices have advanced from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 per cent. To-day business has not been quite so active, the dealers being principally occupied with the arrangement of the half-monthly account. Comparing prices with those that ruled this day week, there has been a rise of 2 per cent. in West Midland, Newport branch: London, Brighton, and South Coast, Sheffield and Metropolitan; of 1 per cent. in Great Northern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Midland; do. Birmingham and Derby and North Eastern (Leeds); and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in London and North Western, North Eastern (Berwick; Do. (York) and North Staffordshire. On the other hand there has been a decline of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in South Eastern, and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in East Anglian. Foreign railway shares have been rather dull, but those connected with the British possessions have been more extensively dealt in, at rather improved quotations.

NEW ZEALAND DEBENTURES.

New Zealand Government Five per cent. debentures for 1,000,000*l.* were offered to public competition yesterday by the crown agents for the colonies, but only a very small portion of the amount was applied for. The minimum price was fixed at 90, which is equal to 5*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* per cent., and at that price the crown agents declared themselves willing for the present to receive tenders for the unallotted portion.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, &c.

At the meeting of the Egyptian Commercial and Trading Company, Mr. J. Larking in the chair, the report was adopted, and a dividend of 5*s.* 3*d.* per share declared. The chairman stated that the business of the Company was being successfully conducted. With respect to the negotiations for an amalgamation with another Company, the result would be communicated to the shareholders at a meeting to be held in September. In reply to questions the chairman stated that, if the amalgamation takes place, the seat of business will be at Alexandria, but meetings would also be held occasionally in England; that, in addition to the sum already reported, 15,000*l.* of profit has been made by trading; that in future the dividends will be paid half-yearly, and that a dividend will be distributed in September on account of the profits up to June.—At a meeting of the directors of the European Bank, Mr. Colchester in the chair, it was resolved to increase the capital of the Company to 4,000,000*l.* by the creation of 40,000 new shares. It was, however, stated by the chairman that there was no immediate intention to issue the new shares, and that they were to be reserved for the purpose of extending the operations of the bank by the purchase of such connexions as are offered to them by established banking houses and companies. It was further stated that a branch would shortly be opened at Marseilles.—At the meeting to-day of the proprietors of the Union Bank of London, the report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the net profits of the bank for the six months ending June 30, after payment of all charges, and making provision for all bad and doubtful debts, amounted to 154,370*l.*, which, with 992*l.* brought forward from the previous account, left for appropriation the sum of 155,363*l.*, out of which a dividend was declared for the half-year at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum free of income tax, and a bonus of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the paid-up capital, being at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, and leaving a balance of 77,363*l.* A special meeting of the proprietors was afterwards held for the purpose of submitting a recommendation that the subscribed capital of the bank be increased from 3,000,000*l.* to 4,000,000*l.*, by the creation of 20,000 new shares of 50*l.* each. Resolutions to the foregoing effect were proposed and agreed to. At the 26th annual general meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of Australia held to-day, a dividend of 2*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share for the half-year was declared, and by way of interest 11*s.* 6*d.* per new share.—At a meeting to-day of the Humber Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, a preliminary report of a very favourable character was read, in which it was stated that eighteen ships were in the course of construction in the company's yards.—The adjourned meeting of the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company, called for to-day, was further adjourned till the 18th inst., for the purpose of ascertaining the result of a definite proposal which had been submitted to the Postmaster General.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

Now that money has again become a little easier, new joint stock projects are again thrown upon the market in great abundance. Amongst the most important is the European and American Finance Corporation (Limited), which is established for the purpose of adopting the business of an existing Company which has been successfully conducted with private capital, and to extend for the first time the system of financial agency to British Columbia, Vancouver's Island, and California. In British Columbia and Vancouver's Island, the Company propose to act as agents in investment, banking and finance, or as immigration agents on behalf of the Government. It is also intended to make advances on buildings, land, agricultural produce, wool, and any property not perishable. The Company is also to receive money on deposit at fixed rates, and issue debentures for long or short periods. The first capital of the Company is to be 500,000*l.*, in 12,500 shares of 20*l.*, of which not more than 10*l.* is to be called up.—Challis's Banking Company (Limited) propose to increase their capital from 10,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* by the issue of additional shares. The bank is carrying on business, and the directors state that at the present time the profits are not less than 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital.—The prospectus has been issued of the Hudiksvale and Forssa Steam Sawing Mills Company (Limited). The capital is fixed at 160,000*l.*, in 3,200 shares of 50*l.* each. The object of the undertaking is to extend the operations of a Company with a similar title established in 1857. The business consists in selling timber from some extensive forests in Sweden, which have been obtained upon leases for 50 years. These forests are stated to cover between 300 and 400 English square miles, or 200,000 to 250,000 acres.—The Robertsfors Ironworks Company (Limited) propose to raise a capital of 300,000*l.*, in 15,000 shares of 20*l.* each, the object being to purchase the extensive estates of Robertsfors and Fredericksfors, in Sweden, comprising about 150,000 acres of freehold and crown lands, with large forests and agricultural districts, as also timber and iron works, ship-building yards, &c. It is also intended to extend the general manufacture of iron, and to introduce Bessemer's steel process. The prospectus has been issued of the Regent's Canal Iron Works Company (Limited). The capital sought to be raised is 250,000*l.* in 12,500 shares of 20*l.* each, with a first issue of 8,000 shares. The Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing the engineering works of Mr. Henry Grissell, in Eagle Wharf Road, Regent's Canal. The works cover a space of $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and possess a frontage of 700 feet, with nearly the same extent of water frontage. Being situated on the Regent's Canal, they are connected with the Thames and with all the railways which run into London.—The Trinidad Petroleum Company (Limited) are seeking to raise a capital of 150,000*l.* in 7,500 shares of 20*l.* each. It is intended to import petroleum from some lake and oil springs, which have the advantage of being situated near to the seacoast, in the island of Trinidad, and whose supply is said to be inexhaustible. It is estimated by the directors that 8,000 tuns of oil may be imported during the first year, at a cost of less than 7*l.* per tun. The vendors have agreed to accept three-fifths of the purchase money in paid-up shares.—The Patent Carriage Company is started, for which a capital of 100,000*l.* is sought to be raised in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each; the issue to be 5,000 shares. It is the intention of the Company to introduce new and improved cabs and carriages of superior contruction, and the directors promise that these shall be 'easier, far more comfortable, considerably lighter, stronger, cheaper, and far more elegant, than any hitherto invented. The Company, it appears, do not intend to horse any of the cabs or carriages, but merely to build and let them to persons of good character duly licensed.—The prospectus of the Vancouver's Island and British-Columbia Fishing and Oil Company (Limited) has been issued. The capital is fixed at 250,000*l.* in 25,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The object of the directors is to establish on the coasts of the above-named colonies and elsewhere fisheries for herrings, salmon, cod, sturgeon, and other fish, for which there is a very considerable demand in the South American markets. The Company's programme includes the manufacturing of oils, isinglass, and caviare, curing the fish and converting the refuse into manure. Fishing stations are to be established at suitable places.—The Thames Plate Glass Company (Limited) is asking for a capital of 250,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 25*l.* each. The Company was originally formed in 1834, with unlimited liability, and it is now considered advisable to re-organise it., The returns hitherto have been very profitable, and the present produce is about 10,000 square feet of polished glass per week, which can easily be increased to upwards of 20,000 feet per week.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce markets do not exhibit any general extension of business, notwithstanding that money is easier, and politics are less uncertain than was the case a short time back. Purchases are still for the most part confined to the requirement of the present period: and where any increased desire to realise is shown, easier rates have to be taken. For the most part, however, importers are firm, and supply the markets sparingly, arrivals during the last few days having been upon a very moderate scale. Cotton has formed almost the only exception to the general quiet, transactions in this article having been extensive, whilst prices have risen fully $\frac{1}{2}$d. per lb. The provision trade progresses slowly but steadily. Navy provisions have sold rather freely, there being a demand for American. Cheese of good quality commands a ready sale, American realising 50*s.* to 58*s.* for good and fine. The grain trade has been inactive, but prices well maintained, the want of genial sunshine and a higher temperature having retarded the progress of the growing crops. Linseed is steady and rapeseed firm. Oilcake has realised a small advance, American barrels being quoted 9*l.* 10*s.* to 9*l.* 15*s.*, and bags 8*l.* 15*s.* per cwt. Seed oils have remained dull of sale, but rape is firmly held at 42*s.* 6*d.* for brown and 45*s.* 6*d.* to 46*s.* for pale. Cocoa-nut has sold rather freely to-day at 40*s.* 3*d.* cash for Cochin, and 38*s.* 9*d.* less rent and interest for Ceylon. Sperm oil remains out of demand at 70*l.* per tun. Petroleum meets a good enquiry at 2*s.* $2\frac{1}{2}$d. on the spot, and 2*s.* 4*d.* for the last three months' delivery. Crude is worth 18*l.* 10*s.* per tun. The tallow market has been and is now extremely dull, but without any material decline in prices. There have been some further variations in metals. English copper-smelters refuse to sell except at 3*l.* to 5*l.* over fixed rates, although they do not officially advise an advance. Spelter has again risen in value, and is now worth 25*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* to 25*l.* 5*s.* per ton. Scotch pig iron, after reaching 59*s.* 9*d.*, closes rather dull to-day at 58*s.* 6*d.* Lead firmly maintains its value. Common jute has again advanced 10*s.* per ton. Manilla hemp sells steadily at 34*l.* to 35*l.*, for fair to good roping. The quarterly sales of East Indian indigo have opened at an advance of 3*d.* to 6*d.* on last sale's rates, for good useful qualities of Bengal and Kurpah, but low qualities do not show improvement. The sugar market during the last day or two has been heavy at 6*d.* decline, importers having offered supplies in excess of demand. Coffee maintains its price, and the Netherlands Trading Company's sales of Java coffee in Holland are to-day reported to have gone off better than expected, prices ranging up to valuations.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 13.—There has been a very active demand for cotton throughout the week, and the market has shown more animation than for a long time past. The enquiries for American have been considerable, but the limited supplies have induced holders to demand increased rates, and the advance must be quoted from $\frac{3}{4}$d. to 1*d.* per lb. There has also been a large demand for nearly all other descriptions, and prices have improved, according to circumstances, from $\frac{1}{2}$d. to, in some few instances, 2*d.* per lb. The sales this week have reached 114,000 bales, of which 55,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year so far have been 1,470,321 bales against 1,106,730 bales to the same period in 1863. There have been imported this year 1,189,102 bales, whilst last year the number was 775,162 bales. The exports this year have been 291,119 bales: same period in 1863, 262,104 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 251,300 bales, whilst last year the number was 250,310 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 284,362 bales, and at the corresponding period in 1863, they were 318,113 bales. The latest quotations this afternoon were, American descriptions, 30*d.* to $32\frac{1}{4}$d.; Pernambuco, 29*d.* to $31\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maranhams, 32*d.*; Maccio, $29\frac{1}{2}$d. to $30\frac{1}{4}$d.; Bahia, $29\frac{1}{2}$d. to 30*d.*; Egyptian, $29\frac{3}{4}$d. to $36\frac{1}{4}$d.; Smyrna, $28\frac{1}{4}$d. to $28\frac{1}{2}$d.; Surat, $15\frac{1}{4}$d. to $25\frac{3}{4}$d.; Bengal, 15*d.* to $15\frac{1}{2}$d.; Scinde, $15\frac{1}{4}$d. to $15\frac{1}{2}$d.; China, $19\frac{1}{4}$d. to $22\frac{1}{4}$d.; and Japan, $20\frac{3}{4}$d. to $21\frac{1}{2}$d.

There has been a stronger tendency to transact business in the Manchester markets during the last few days, but buyers have been completely paralysed in their operations through the increased pretensions of manufacturers. Shipping yarns have been largely inquired for, but the dealings have been very limited, in consequence of the high prices demanded. It is said that a great many second-hand lots bought last week, have been resold at prices considerably below what spinners are now willing to accept, nevertheless buyers are placed in a position of some difficulty—they want goods, and a feeling is prevalent that if they do not order at the terms now offered, they may be in a few days compelled to give them higher rates. In home-trade yarns a moderate business has been transacted generally at an advance of 1*d.* per lb., but spinners in some cases have demanded an advance of 2*d.* to 3*d.* per lb., while some spinners in the present state of affairs refuse to name any quotation whatever. In the cloth market the improvement of last week continues; a large business has been transacted, especially in shirtings suitable for India. Buyers at present prefer suiting themselves out of stocks in preference to giving orders; but when manufacturers take orders to make, they will not accept unless at a considerable advance, in consequence of the high price of the raw material. Buyers appear in a great measure taken by surprise at the rates demanded, and this has had the effect of checking business considerably. The closing quotations are for 25 to 27 in. $\frac{7}{8}$ for grey printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 16*s.* 9*d.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ grey madrapollams, 7*s.* $10\frac{1}{2}$d. to 10*s.* $4\frac{1}{2}$d.; $\frac{9}{8}$ grey printers, 13*s.* $1\frac{1}{2}$d. to 18*s.* 6*d.*; $\frac{5}{4}$ grey shirtings, 13*s.* 3*d.* to 27*s.* 6*d.*; water twist, No. 20, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* $10\frac{1}{2}$d.; No. 30, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; and No. 40, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; mule twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; No. 70, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 8*d.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* 1*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 9*d.* to 4*s.* 7*d.*

HUBBUCK'S PATENT WHITE ZINC PAINT.

THE most durable and beautiful paint known, is cheaper than White Lead, and is proved to be superior for all purposes than the pernicious Lead Paint, and equally adapted for all climates. Its whiteness is unaffected by bilge water, boiling sugar, or noxious gases. It is free from any poisonous ingredient, and suited in all respects to the use of the painter. Each Cask of Pure White Zinc is Stamped 'HUBBUCK, LONDON PATENT.' Inferior Zinc Paint, so marked, having been sold in Foreign Markets, the Patentees offer a Reward of FIFTY POUNDS for information which will lead to the conviction, in an English or Colonial Court, of those who have pirated their Mark. Both Exporters and Retailers are liable for its sale.

THE FOURTH OF JULY—THE ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS—THE CHANGED ASPECT OF AFFAIRS—THE POSITION OF GRANT—MR. LINCOLN CALLS FOR TROOPS—THE NEW CONSCRIPTION ACT—THE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTY—MR. CHASE'S LEGACY TO HIS SUCCESSOR.

YESTERDAY in this city was devoted to the celebration of the anniversary of Independence—the beginning of the revolutions which made the independence of the States who afterwards made the Union. Business was suspended; shops and stores were shut up; the Post-Office and the banks were closed; all the flags were out in a flaunting wind; and there were reviews of troops, and military and civic feasts, and the firing of guns and the popping of India crackers throughout the streets all day. Yet there was little real hilarity. The Fourth of July has been a day for the annual outbreak of national vanity, for boastful comparisons of American superiority in prowess, and freedom, and happiness, over the rest of mankind, and vain-glorious anticipations of the grandeur of American destiny, which, in these disjointed times, with a land torn asunder in civil strife and reeking with carnage, and given up on one part to senseless waste, and on the other to cruel devastation, it were a grotesque folly to repeat, and which it engenders rage or sadness to recall, as men are stung into passion or moved to regret when confronted with the knowledge of the ruin they have brought upon themselves.

The Declaration of Independence was made by political communities assuming each a separate independence and sovereignty for itself, and with no other ties among them than a voluntary association. The common principle of justification which they asserted for the act of separating from a Government which described itself, as this does now, as the freest and most beneficent in the world, was that Governments 'derive their just powers from the consent of the governed,' who have the right to alter and abolish forms, and 'to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organising its power in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.' There is a hideous incongruity in the public commemoration of such an event with bonfires and feastings and outcry and national triumphings, by a people which is at the same time sending forth millions of armed men to trample down in blood the right of eleven sovereign States and eight millions of people born free to choose their own government, and compel them to be vassals to one they are struggling with unanimity to throw off. The whole ceremonial of the Fourth of July has come to be an anachronism and a fraud in the North—a mere holiday of custom in which there is no longer the fervour of faith or the heartiness of hope.

Yesterday Congress adjourned after a session of six months, to meet again in December. In the interim there is to be a Presidential election under portentous circumstances and amidst such raging passions that it will be almost a miracle if there be not revolutionary disorders within the North added to the disasters of its accomplished disruption from the South.

When this Congress met, the President received them with his felicitations on the pleasing prospect of the early close of the war, and invited them to confer with him on the disposition to be made of the vanquished and their estates. Gold was at 150, but the Secretary of the Treasury promised that it would soon fall, and the Government currency be gradually and surely re-established by the measures which he had contrived. To make these things sure, Congress gave the Secretary everything he asked for, sometimes against its own recorded opinions that what he asked was useless or pernicious; and the Government, to give the final overwhelming coup to the expiring rebellion, organised, after eight months' preparation, a vast campaign, putting, according to the declaration of the Military Committee of the House, 700,000 new troops into the field, and placing at the head of hosts which can be reckoned up at more than a million of men the commander in whose genius it had the most unbounded confidence, and bestowing upon him unlimited means, and, as it now protests, unfettered discretion to carry out his own plans.

When the Congress adjourned gold was at 230. The Government currency, which in December was worth 66 cents in the dollar, had fallen to 43, a decline of 22 per cent. In one of the popular panics springing out of the Government measures and the national disasters, it had fallen to 280 for 100 in gold, or to less than 36 cents for the dollar. The Secretary, perplexed and enraged, accepted an affront as the excuse for escaping from office, and left it in helpless confusion, with a published record that the case is wellnigh desperate.

The fortunes of the grand army demonstration are told with unmistakable distinctness in two facts. Early in May, a few days after General Grant crossed the Rapidan and commenced that series of battles which the Secretary of War announced to the world as the beginning of the crowning triumph, President Lincoln solemnly invited the people to meet in their places of worship and offer thanksgiving to God for the victory. Nearly two months afterwards, and only three days before their adjournment, the two Houses of Congress united in a resolution addressed to the President, requesting him to appoint a day of 'humiliation and prayer,' to implore the aid of the Almighty for 'the suppression of the rebellion.' They had begun to doubt whether, without some new interposition of Providence, even the 'strongest battalions' can give them the victory.

Notwithstanding the occasional bulletins from Secretary Stanton which seem to assume that General Grant means to take Petersburg or Richmond, nothing is clearer than that all expectations of making any further attempt for that purpose are suspended. Grant is brought to a standstill in his operations, fortifying himself to remain where he is if General Lee does not find a way to compel him to get away, and waiting for new and heavy reinforcements before he can hope to make any progress forward. All the supporting columns with which he was making a converging approach against Richmond, so strong as to be irresistible, have failed, and military operations on his part are confined to mere raids for the interruption of communications, which are readily repaired, and therefore the raids are wasting away his best troops without adequate results for the loss. By the latest accounts Lee, instead of being cooped up about Richmond, feels so strong there, that he is alarming the people at Washington with demonstrations towards the capital, and, if not actually moving troops in that direction, can afford to disturb the nerves of Northern people with the apprehension of being invaded themselves.

The military measures with which Congress closed its work show the extent of their disappointment in the campaigning of Grant, and their sense of the necessity of new and extraordinary measures to maintain him where he is.

It was stated by Senator Wilson, the Chairman of the Military Committee, that calls for troops since the beginning of the war have been responded to to the number of 1,800,000 men. The numbers are literally over 2,300,000; but some of these were for short periods, and he averages them at 1,800,000 three years' men; for the two past years the demand has been so great that the supply is exhausted, and as a new levy is to be had, new laws have been passed to make conscription more rigid and the supply compulsory.

The new law authorises the President to call into the service any number of men at his discretion, for one, two, or three years, and allows, in addition to the pay, a bounty of $100 for one year's men, $200 for two years, and $300 for three years. Fifty days' notice is to be given for volunteers, at the expiration of which period a draft for the deficient number is to be made, and no payment of money will be accepted by the Government in commutation for the personal service of the drafted men.

But the white men of the North are to be relieved to some extent by the permission to the executive of any State to fill up his quota in the rebel States, with three enumerated exceptions—that is, they may collect negro soldiers from among the slaves, and take credit for them in the State quota.

The repeal of the commutation fee makes forced service from all who are unable to supply substitutes, of which the cost is likely to range very high from the scarcity of men and the almost universal disinclination to the service. It is an indirect coercion of the rich to come forward at once and secure themselves from the danger of being drafted hereafter by buying up substitutes in advance, for which the Provost-Marshal-General has supplied a form to entitle them to exemption. Upon this indirect pressure the Government counts, in order to help its recruiting by contributions exacted by terror from men who will pay largely rather than risk the chance of being compelled to fight. Congress further imposed a special tax of five per cent. on all incomes exceeding $600 per annum, in addition to the taxes laid for general revenue, for the purpose of paying the bounties to the men who may be drafted.

These very severe and exacting laws confirm the representations which come from Washington that General Grant has assured the President, and through him the committees of Congress have been instructed, that, without an addition of at least 300,000 men, the campaigns in the South have no reasonable prospect of success, and that expectations of a successful issue of the war, even during the next year, must wait on the supply of that number of recruits.

There was vigorous opposition to this Bill. The repeal of the commutation clause was strenuously resisted, and more than once defeated by the aid of votes usually friendly to the Administration. It was urged that it was harsh and unjust, would work odious discriminations against the poor, might be avoided by other measures, and would certainly be unpopular, and might lead to dangerous popular excitements, perhaps riot and resistance. It was finally declared by the representatives of the Administration that the measure is indispensable to fill up the army; otherwise the armies would be broken up, and the war must stop at once. These representations had no effect on the Opposition; none of them voted for the Bill. But the Republican members were nearly all brought back to the party—enough of them to carry the Bill by a vote of 65 to 53, in the absence of some seventy members afraid to vote.

The violence of these measures, the vacillations of Congress, and the forebodings of evil from them under which they were driven through on the Government appeal for help in a crisis of peril, are the infallible signs of sensibility which was really felt by the Administration and by Congress at the failure of all the hopes reposed on the gigantic campaign of Grant. A new and great army, such as it is confessed with inward trembling that it is doubtful whether any possible exertion can raise, and the attempt to raise which is looked for as the possible premonitor of insurrection and revolution, is the demand of the Government, in order to give renewed hope of the subjugation of the South in another campaign.

This is the unpromising state in which Congress leaves the military condition of the Union to the care of Mr. Lincoln. He wants at least three hundred thousand more men; and to obtain men and support armies he has need of money—immense sums—immediately. How did Congress leave him in these respects?

I will not go over the views I have so often expressed in your paper on the general condition of the Federal finances, and the rapid and irreversible steps it is making towards bankruptcy. It is briefly expressed in the fact that the credit of the Government has fallen as a normal condition to more than fifty per cent. discount with a fixed tendency downwards, and has sometimes ranged through nominal extremes of rise and fall fifty per cent. in a day on the paper denominations, under the effects of some Government measure or the tidings or apprehension of some disaster.

Secretary Chase may be taken as reliable authority for the best possible statement that can be made of the condition of the finances, and the value of the measures which Congress has furnished to give relief to the Treasury. Stating what Congress has done, we may judge of the effect by the estimate which the ex-Secretary of the Treasury placed upon it at the moment of quitting his office and making a record of the condition in which he left it.

The two revenue acts are the Internal Tax Act and the Tariff Act.

Both of these impose very high and exceedingly burdensome taxes. Besides their revenue character, they have a political character, which will be found to be of serious importance in affecting that struggle which is threatened between opposing parties for the overthrow of the whole system of which they are a part. There are loud complaints that both Bills were shaped in the interest of favoured classes and sections, and that their effect will be to distribute the burdens of government unequally, to mortgage the whole property and labour of the country for ever in favour of the capitalists, and make the interior and the West merely tributaries to New England. These consequences need not be dwelt on, except so far as that the anticipated agitation of these questions may affect, and possibly reduce, the amount of revenue which the new Bills are computed as likely to furnish.

Leaving the question of the currency untouched, and thus omitting the most essential point for the restoration of credit, Mr. Chase undertook, in letters addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means, to warn Congress that the provisions of these Bills are insufficient to enable the Treasury to meet its lowest wants for the coming year. He showed then that the deficit of the last year, being the excess of expenditure over revenue, was $640,000,000, which excludes two months' arrearages of pay due to the army, and every debt and claim except those which are actually audited and paid. Of these there are known to be hundreds of millions—but let that pass now.

The highest aggregate revenue which the Secretary anticipates under the new legislation is put at $318,000,000.

The estimated expenditures of the current year he states with remarkable caution, warned, as he confesses, by his disappointments in the estimates of last year, which were based on the expectation of military successes which never came. He says, with extreme caution, that they cannot fall below $750,000,000, but are more likely to reach to $800,000,000 or $850,000,000. Abating $50,000,000 from the sum which he thinks may be required, he makes the minimum deficit of the coming year $482,000,000 to be added to the debt, and to be supplied by loans.

Congress has authorised loans to the amount of $400,000,000.

Mr. Chase thereupon warned Congress that if all these loans could be negotiated, and the expenditures should be only at the reduced rate to which his estimate pares them down, there would be still a deficit of $82,000,000 on the year.

His estimate of what was likely, before being pared down, to show an average would make the deficit $135,000,000 beyond the revenues and the credit of the Government.

The estimate was sufficiently alarming in the naked force of the figures as admitted; but these figures evidently understate the expenditures, which continue to expand in actual amount with the progress of the war, and to swell the accelerating decline of the currency and the consequent expansion of prices. If the loans should not all be taken, and the expenditures reach, as is most likely, to hundreds of millions beyond the estimate of Mr. Chase, the deficit beyond the capacity and authority of the Treasury will be enormous, and the Government must stop payments.

After laying this alarming exhibit before Congress, and proposing some amendments to the Internal Tax Bill, by which he computed that $85,000,000 might be raised, Mr. Chase suddenly quitted office—whether voluntarily or by constraint on his will which he could not overcome, or positive coercion which he could not resist, does not clearly appear. The President eagerly took him at his offer, and prevented its recall by instantly forwarding the name of a successor so utterly unacceptable that it was almost as abruptly withdrawn. A successor was then found in Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, a man of capacity and generally esteemed for fairness and integrity of character. But Congress nevertheless adjourned without making the provision which Mr. Chase had announced as indispensable to carry on the government. The supplemental tax of 5 per cent. on incomes is an extraordinary levy—for soldiers' bounties—not included in Mr. Chase's table of wants.

The new Secretary is a bold man to take a post abandoned to him, with such desparing warnings of evils to come, by a man who, until within a few weeks, was upheld by the Government and its friends as a sagacious and infallible guide.

All round the horizon the Northern aspects are cloudy, and contrast gloomily with the exhilarations of the last Fourth of July, when the capture of Vicksburg spread universal exultation, and the whole North was joyous with the expectation of a speedy and complete triumph, restored empire, and renewed prosperity.

July 3, 1864.

THE ARGUELLES CASE—PROSECUTION OF GENERAL DIX—THE REMOVAL OF COLONEL BOWMAN—THE SPLIT IN THE CABINET—THE FEUD BETWEEN CHASE AND SEWARD—THE CHASE PARTY AND THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—THE PEACE PARTY AND ITS CHANCES—MR. VALLANDIGHAM—HARVEST PROSPECTS IN THE WEST.

The conflicts of jurisdiction between the authorities of the State of New York and the authorities of the general Government, although deferred, are not by any means adjusted.

In the case of the Spaniard Arguelles, taken by United States Marshal Murray under an order from the Secretary of State, and sent off in secret to Cuba, the prosecution of the Marshal and deputies, under the New York statute, for unlawfully taking a resident by force out of the jurisdiction of the State, is resisted under the plea that a statute of the United States removes such cases into the Federal courts. The rejoinder is, first, that this is not a case arising under the United States statute, and secondly, that the statute is unconstitutional, and these questions will have to go through the courts.

In the case of the seizure of the Journal of Commerce and the World by the United States military under orders from the Secretary of War, the first step taken for redress was under the directions of Governor Seymour, who instructed the Attorney-General to bring the case before the grand jury. Judge Russell, of the City Court, charged the grand jury especially to enquire into the cases as involving important questions of personal liberty and the rights of property. The grand jury took a political view of the question, and instead of enquiring, as they were sworn to do, 'into such matters and things as should be given them in charge,' voted that it was 'inexpedient' to examine into this matter—thus, by the refusal to act at all, defeating the effort of the Governor to vindicate the State jurisdiction and enforce State laws. The Governor was displeased with this decision of the grand jury, and directed the district attorney, A. Oakey Hall, to bring the case directly before a committing magistrate. Mr. Hall submitted the testimony to Judge Russell, who thereupon issued a warrant for the arrest of Major-General Dix, the United States commanding officer of the district, and the several officers under his command who were employed in suppressing these papers and keeping custody of the offices. They appeared before the Judge, and entered into recognisances to appear on a future day, when their council shall have examined the papers. General Dix, although obeying the orders from Washington, is understood to have disapproved of them, and to have exerted himself to have them rescinded. This case will doubtless take the same course as that of Arguelles, in being demanded to be transferred to the Federal courts under the same statute. There is not the same doubt, however, about the application of the statute. It was designed to include all cases of powers assumed by the President in the exercise of authority to suppress the rebellion. The point directly raised is, whether Congress was competent to divest the State of New York of its whole jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, and to bestow it upon the courts of the United States under a plea of military necessity resting in the single discretion of the United States Executive, where there is no proclamation of martial law and no public enemy. The Governor of the State is resolute, at last, on one point, which is, to see whether there be not some way of reasserting and recovering by legal process the rights of the States over their own internal affairs, which have been so often and so arbitrarily usurped by the Federal authorities that it has begun to be doubted whether States are to be permitted to have any jurisdiction which it might be thought expedient by the President to take away from them. The Governor is very tardy in making this issue, after having permitted so many opportunities on provocations quite as serious to go by him without his being moved to resist. It comes on at a time, too, when it will have but an insignificant influence, if any, on the course of public affairs. The usurpations and encroachments of the Administration have been so many and so flagrant, and have been so condoned by popular frenzy, and so countenanced by the servility of courts sympathising with the savage passions of Government, that, in the revolutionary storms which now threaten to overthrow the whole political fabric, these attempts at civil remedies for the dangers that environ it will be as futile to arrest its doom as those of a despairing pilot in his frantic grasps, when the ship is driving helplessly upon the reef, at the wheel, a few turns of which by a strong hand an hour before would have placed her in the track of safety.

The Administration has been doing an insufferably mean and malignant act in the removal of Lieutenant-Colonel Bowman from command as Superintendent of the United States Military Academy at West Point. The received cause of the removal is the refusal of Colonel Bowman to alter, at the dictation of the Government, the order of celebration at the recent dedication of the Battle Monument at that place, so as to exclude General M'Clellan, who had been selected as the orator of the day. It is certain that the President and Secretary of War sent to demand a change in that respect, and that they were not gratified. This interposition was an attempt at paltry tyranny, the baseness of which is merely aggravated if it be true, as charged and credited, that an honourable and useful officer was punished for not lending himself to aid in making it successful. In that strong reaction which is evidently going on in favour of General M'Clellan, he is essentially helped by these multiplying evidences that the Administration feels towards him an unrelenting, persecuting malignity, which is not only not lessened, but seems to grow more bitter as the progress of the military campaigns of the year have extorted from them the acknowledgment, in fact, of the great superiority of M'Clellan's judgment of the power and resources of the South, and of his plans for military success, over those of the Administration and of all the generals it has called into its councils since they displaced him. It is not my faith that M'Clellan would have succeeded on his own plans, but events have decided unanswerably that all the plans favoured above his have failed, with horrible loss and enormous cost, and that they who hated him would not give him a fair chance to try his own. He might not have been a successful man, but it is felt that he was deeply injured, and has been followed with unrelenting rancour. Politically, it is fortunate for him that he was saved from the defeats which might have followed him as they have followed successively all of those who have come after him, from Burnside to Grant, and that, in the rising indignation in the country against the military blunderings of the Administration, he can be presented by his admirers as the one leader, in the discarding of whom his enemies in the Government threw away their best chance for victory. It is doing a great deal for his personal fame, and will help to make him a prominent candidate for the nomination at Chicago for the Presidency.

The Cabinet explosions at Washington may alter the aspects of the Presidential campaign very materially.

While Mr. Chase was in the Cabinet there was a clear and well-recognised obligation on him and his personal adherents to support Mr. Lincoln for reelection. In fact, that section of the party and of the Cabinet with which Mr. Chase is identified as a leader and representative man, was understood to have achieved a victory in the Nominating Convention at Baltimore, and to have secured the control of the party to their own use. The Cabinet, like the party elsewhere, is known to have been divided internally into two factions, of which the prominent members of what is called the Radical division were Secretaries Chase, Welles, and Stanton, the Treasury, the Navy, and War; and on the other or Conservative side, Messrs. Seward and Blair, of the State Department and the Post Office. The feuds between these factions were patent to the public. The President's personal leanings were for the Seward side—his party needs drew him towards the other. Undoubtedly he trafficked with both; but the party which he least pleased was that of the Radicals, a portion of whom resented it by the nomination of Fremont at Cleveland. Mr. Chase being ruled off the track for the Republican nomination, remained sullenly in the Cabinet, even after the President's unfriendly demonstrations in rewarding, by an unconstitutional promotion, General Blair, the brother of Secretary Blair, immediately after the General had become the public accuser and assailant of the Secretary of the Treasury for maladministration and corruption in office. The Convention at Baltimore was looked to, to obtain the means of controlling the President by the voice of assembled partisans there, whose 'radical' propensities were not doubted, and at that Convention their triumph was thought to be secure. They obtained the passage of a resolution which, ambiguously drawn, and making simply a demand for 'harmony' in the public councils, was interpreted by themselves as a demand for the removal of Messrs Seward and Blair; and it was boldly averred that this was the intent of the resolution, with the previous understanding of the President. Henry Ward Beecher, who attended the Convention, proclaimed this in his paper as binding the President with an obligation 'to make changes in his Cabinet.' He wrote thus:—'That resolution was fired at two targets, Mr. Blair and Mr. Seward—those two St. Sebastians, pierced of many arrows, and slowly dying of their wounds. A member of the Committee on Resolutions told us that, though euphemisms were put before the public, there was no sparing of plain talk in the committee room—that mincemeat was made of those two Cabinet officers—as the song says, a pretty dish to set before the President.' I quote this to show you the confidence with which the Chase Radicals counted on having obtained the control of the party, and the mastery over his rivals in the Cabinet. In less than a month Mr. Chase is forced out of the Cabinet, and the Albany Evening Journal—the special organ of Mr. Seward—under the signature of his special friend, Thurlow Weed, hails it with a shout of exultation. It is a 'streak of daylight,' and the accepted sign that the reign of 'despotism' is 'at an end;' although it would be difficult to show where a more unscrupulous and unrelenting despot could be found than Mr. Seward has proved himself to be during the darkness of the last three years.

Mr. Chase is thus, instead of being master in the Cabinet, put out of it, and is hooted at as a vanquished enemy by the partisans of Mr. Seward. A feud thus commenced is not likely to be appeased. Mr. Chase, out of power, is certainly not the formidable personage he was when he held the keys of the Treasury—dispensed all the favours which grow out of the disposal of hundreds of offices which give infinite opportunities for making fortunes and helping friends—and in the handling of thousands of millions of dollars of the public money: and he must look for the falling off from him of the crowds of sycophants who lately followed him obsequiously, and watched his looks, and picked up his words, and clamoured everywhere in admiration of everything he said and did, just for the percentage they hoped to make by getting as close to his office secrets as possible. These men will flock after a new leader. But Mr. Chase is, out of office, still a powerful leader in a powerful party, without the favour of which the Administration would be speedily left in a hopeless minority. On the earnest and enthusiastic among them he will have the claim of having been a martyr, or having made a sacrifice in their cause, and, whatever course he may take, will give a strong direction to the action of a large portion of the Republicans during the coming canvass. His own predilections, on political grounds, would be, beyond doubt, towards General Fremont, as were those of many of his most prominent friends who have, since the Baltimore nomination, given in their adhesion to Mr. Lincoln, but will be guided in their future course by that of Mr. Chase. There is great interest, much beyond what is expressed by expectant parties who are looking to profit by this feud in their attempt to overthrow the Administration, in watching the developments of the course of Mr. Chase and his friends, some of whom have already given indications of hostility by resigning their appointments under Mr. Lincoln, and others are preparing for a threatened sweep out of office of all the adherents of Mr. Chase who may have the power of influencing a vote. The intensity of feeling which this spirit has already elicited between different branches of the Republicans, inspires hopes among the Opposition that they may yet succeed by a judicious coalition with the malcontents.

But the chief obstacle to such a coalition arises out of the wide-spread and growing determination among large masses of the Democrats to enter into no alliances and vote for no candidate who is a war candidate by his antecedents or by the pledges made for him in any nomination. The postponement of the Chicago Convention is in the interests of peace, and every day adds force to the under-current of a swelling public opinion that the war must be stopped, and that it is criminal to do anything which shall pledge the country or the Government to a continuance of it a day beyond that at which it can be stopped, leaving the adjustment of all other questions and relations to subsequent consideration in peace. It is now said that the nomination of M'Clellan, lately held to be absolutely certain if the Convention had been held on the 4th of July, is endangered, if not defeated, by the delay; and there are certainly very energetic and combined movements on foot to bring forward at Chicago, and with the hope of nominating him, a clear and undisguised peace candidate; and it is by no means sure, in the present aspect of the country, that public opinion and the course of public events may not, within the next two months, break up existing combinations, and force on, at the next Presidential election, the issue of war or peace, drawn distinctly between two candidates. It is rash to make any predictions or confident anticipations in a state of affairs so anomalous and exceptional as that on which we are entering. I can only say that there are men of standing and political sagacity who are sanguine enough to look for that way of exit out of the calamities of this hour, through the roused energies of the people, and by virtue of the chastening effect of public calamity on their passions.

Vallandigham is still at large, notwithstanding the original order for his arrest, in the following terms, stands unrevoked. It is dated May 19, 1863, and directed to General Burnside:—

'Sir,—The President directs that, without delay, you send C. L. Vallandigham, under secure guard, to the head-quarters of General Rosecrans, to be put by him beyond our military lines, and in case of his return within our lines, he be arrested and kept in close custody for the term specified in his sentence.'

Mr. Sarlsburg, Senator from Delaware, lately defied the President, in a public speech in the Senate, to execute that sentence, and warned him that any attempt to arrest Mr. Vallandigham again, except by due course of law, would be resisted, 'forcibly' if necessary; and Mr. Vallandigham goes at large, and will be a leading member in the Convention at Chicago. The President, it is said, had the nerve at one time to order the arrest, but his more prudent friends dissuaded him from pursuing the matter.

Among the other troubles with which this country is now threatened, is that of bad crops again. Enough is known to make it certain that in most of the Western States there will not be more than half a crop. The effect of this, directly, on the temper of the people, and, indirectly, on the finances and the politics of the country, you may estimate very highly. The deficiency of last year's harvests has been reckoned among the causes of the high price of gold, by an extraordinary demand for food. A repetition of the calamity is highly discouraging, and it will not be difficult to turn the local distresses and privations it must cause to the uses of party, and against the manufacturing and capitalist sections, which continue to thrive under Government bounties, while the farmers of the West are overtaxed and starving.

Thoroughly in Earnest.—The Times of Monday published a letter from its Richmond correspondent, from which we take the following:—'No people were ever more thoroughly in earnest than the people of these States. The schools have all been closed except for boys and girls of tender years; women who have been delicately reared willingly forego the luxuries and comforts to which they have been accustomed all their lives, and give up their linen and silks for the coarse fabrics produced by the looms of the country; they perform the postal service in many parts of the country, and may be found at the wayside "homes," the hospitals, the sewing establishments, and, indeed, wherever there is work to be done or suffering to be assuaged. Wealthy planters and thrifty merchants and bankers gladly take their places in the trenches, and bear all the fatigues of the campaign equally with the poorest; ministers vacate their pulpits to preach in the woods and fields, and greyhaired fathers send their sons to the camp and take their places at the handles of the plough. And now, when the army is engaged in a mortal struggle with a multitudinous foe, pious people everywhere, of every sex and condition, in public meeting and private devotions, offer prayers day and night without ceasing for the success of the cause and the safety of their loved ones. Can such a people be conquered? Ought such a people to be subjugated? Even boys of fourteen and fifteen years of age run away from their parents to join the army. And what are the horrors from which these people are striving to escape? The inhabitants residing on either bank of the lower waters of James River had already suffered all the evils which usually follow in the bloody track of civil war, but it has been reserved for General Butler to impose new burdens and practise additional barbarities. In some instances the men have been shot down by drunken black soldiers, or scourged to death, and then nailed to trees and gateposts; and their neighbours, for asking permission to inter their remains, have been forced from their homes and transported to distant prisons. Where the men have been made to suffer thus, the reader may imagine, though I shall not attempt to depict, the unmentionable horrors to which tender women have been subjected, and under which they have actually perished! Meanwhile, the world looks on with folded hands, and grave European statesmen even desire the success of the party, one of whose trusted officers is this wretch Butler!'

Casualties.—We are requested to publish the following list of casualties in Slocomb's Battery, 5th Company Washington Artillery, from New Orleans, on the 28th ult., in Georgia, near Dallas:—Killed: Corporal W. W. Sewell, W. M'Gregor, T. B. Winston. Wounded: Corporal J. T. Beggs, Charles Watson, T. J. White.—Fenner's Louisiana Battery: At Dalton, May 9:—Killed: Peter Graham. Wounded: J. L. Pierson.—Resaca, May 15:—Killed: Frank Muller. Wounded: W. Corprew, W. F. Hosmer, Charles V. Fisher.—New Hope Church, May 25: Killed: Corporal William Brunet, R. A. Brigdin. Wounded: Lieutenant Wat. T. Cluverius, Corporals M'Grath and M'Carthy, Geo. T. Dunbar, Joseph Murphy, Jo. Brigdin, Robert Ford, E. O. Eaton, Joshua Corprew, W. T. Vandry, Joseph Reeves, J. T. Pecot.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

GENERAL GRANT at the latest dates was supposed to be preparing for another assault on the Confederate lines at Petersburg. On June 30, General W. F. Smith, with a portion of the 18th Army Corps, made an attack, which was intended for a surprise, against the position at the White House. Two circumstances rendered success impossible, and involved a serious disaster. The Confederates were aware of the intended movement, and a mistake was made in executing the orders, so that the troops advanced in solid column instead of by companies. The Confederates waited until the enemy was well in range, and then opened a terrific fire. General Smith had no other resource than to withdraw his troops as hastily as he could to the shelter of his breastworks. Meanwhile, the Confederates have advanced to the North, and there is great agitation in the border counties of Pennsylvania and in Washington. The accounts of this movement are unusually meagre and conflicting, so that, until we get intelligence from the South, we shall not know what Confederate force has entered Maryland, whether the expedition is a raid, or whether there is reason for the panic that has induced Mr. Lincoln to call upon the militia to defend Washington. It appears that General Sigel, who has now been superseded by General Lowe, was attacked at Bunker Hill on July 3; that he was defeated, compelled to evacuate Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry, and take up a position on Maryland Heights. General Hunter on the 3rd inst. was at Charleston, Virginia. His army was thoroughly exhausted, and his position was considered critical. In his retreat his losses in men, guns, ammunition, and stores were very heavy.

General Wilson has been completely defeated. On June 22 he started on an expedition for the purpose of destroying the track of the Danville railroad. Mr. Stanton endeavoured to make out that the expedition had been successful, although it had to retreat with the loss of 1,000 men. It subsequently transpired that the losses were nearly three times that number. It will be seen from an account dated Richmond, July 1, that General Wilson's command was so badly cut up that he only escaped with a remnant thereof, that the negroes that he had kidnapped were liberated, and that he lost all his artillery and baggage. It is not true, as stated by Mr. Stanton, that General Wilson had thoroughly destroyed sixty miles of railway; on the contrary, the superintendent of the line reports that the damage done can easily be repaired in two weeks.

Sigel, Hunter, and Wilson being thus disposed of, and Grant being held in check before Petersburg, the Confederate march into Maryland was unopposed, and Harper's Ferry, Sharpsburg, Hagerstown, Frederick City, and other places were occupied. To meet this fresh difficulty President Lincoln has called out 12,000 New York militia, the same from Pennsylvania, and 5,000 from Massachusetts. Governor Seymour has ordered that none of the militia under this call shall leave New York until further orders.

MR. STANTON reports that General Johnston has been compelled to evacuate his encampment at Kenesaw Mountain, and that Sherman occupied Marietta and Kenesaw on the 3rd instant. No details are given, and therefore Mr. Stanton's announcement did not reassure those who were anxious about Sherman's position.

THERE has been some fighting near St. Charles, Arkansas. On June 27 the Federals attacked General Selby, and claim a victory, but, however this may be, they retreated on the following day.

THE Federal ironclad Ocean Queen was taken by the Confederates on the White River on June 24. Her guns and stores were removed and the vessel burned, to prevent her recapture by Federal gunboats.

FOR a long time after the battle before Petersburg on June 22, the Federal dead were left unburied, and the Federal wounded were left uncared for on the field. General Grant endeavoured to enter into a compact with the Confederate commander, so that he might bury his dead and remove his wounded without making the formal request which is an admission of defeat. General Lee, however, was firm, and ultimately General Grant had to make the request in the usual manner.

ON June 28, an application, pursuant to the instructions of Governor Seymour, was made to Judge Russell of New York, for a warrant to arrest General Dix and others for their proceedings in connection with the seizure of the World and Journal of Commerce. After hearing very lengthy affidavits the application was granted, and the warrant was made returnable on July 1. On that day, Mr. E. D. Smith, the counsel for General Dix, said his client was perfectly willing to submit himself to the civil authorities, but wished that the case might be postponed for a week. This request was granted. The next time the matter came before the judge, General Dix and his counsel exhibited instructions from President Lincoln ordering General Dix not to submit to the civil process, and, if necessary, to resist it by force. It will be remembered that Governor Seymour, in his letter of instructions to the district attorney, expressly promised any assistance that might be necessary in carrying them out. As the case now stands, then, Governor Seymour has declared that he will vindicate the rights of the citizens of New York, by force if necessary; and, on the other hand, President Lincoln declares that he will resist the civil process by force.

The affidavits sworn before Judge Russell are very voluminous, and recapitulate the accounts that were given at the time of the suppression of the papers, and the affidavits are distinct as to the violence exhibited by the soldiers, and also as to the robberies committed in the editorial rooms of the World.

MARTIAL law has been proclaimed in Kentucky. The reason assigned for this by the Administration is the military movements of the Confederates. We think it very likely that there are other reasons. At the Democratic Convention held at Louisville, the following resolution was carried by acclamation:—

'That the coercion and subjugation of eleven or more sovereign States was never contemplated as possible, or authorised by the Constitution.'

The resolutions throughout are intensely peaceful in their tone. Mr. Davis, who sits in the Federal Congress as Senator for Kentucky, in the course of a discussion which took place on June 23 in the Senate, said: 'A change had come over the spirit of a majority of the loyal people of the United States, and they desired to bring the war to a close. They had seen the powers of the Government grossly perverted, threatening their liberties. This was the deepening conviction of the people, and it was not strange it should be so. At the commencement of the war he (Mr. Davis) was a coercionist, but he was not one now.'

THE soldiers under the command of General Dix are a portion of the Invalid Corps. These soldiers are in the prime of life, they exhibit no infirmity, and if they suffer from any disease it is not of a character to prevent them fulfilling their duties. The Invalid Corps is, according to the statement of the Democratic party, an instrument devised by Mr. Lincoln to act for him as a kind of bodyguard. The term 'Invalid Corps' is, of course, a mere disguise.

THE Fourth of July was not celebrated with much enthusiasm in the North. The New York Times says despondently that this year there are no remarkable series of victories to celebrate, and other papers took advantage of the anniversary to point out the danger to which the country is exposed by the despotism of the Lincoln Government. The Boston Courier writes:—'It is needless to recapitulate the insidious and flagitious approaches of a wide-grasping despotism which, under plausible names, would deceive a once free and great people, only the more closely to enfold them in its fatal embrace. Its designs are palpable to the meanest understanding which party sophistications have not bewildered. But it is weak if we resolve to be strong, and will flee like a monster to its cave if we will only act like men. If we have the spirit and courage to redeem ourselves, the day of our redemption draweth nigh. Let us then contemplate the price put into our hands to get wisdom. Let us buy and sell it not. Let us, at whatever hazard and sacrifice, recover the inestimable inheritance of former days. If we show ourselves worthy of the prize, the very genius of liberty, divinely armed, will lead and animate us to a glorious triumph. Upon us it depends, and now, whether we shall be slaves or freemen.'

GENERAL M'CLELLAN was present, and delivered a speech, on the occasion of laying the foundation-stone of a monument that is to be erected to the memory of the West Point graduates who have fallen or who may fall during the present war. Much to the surprise of the people of the North, Colonel Bowman has been dismissed from his position as superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, because it was through his invitation that General M'Clellan took the above part. The journals opposed to the Government denounce the dismissal of Colonel Bowman as an act of personal malice. Our New York correspondent gives an account of this affair.

THE Democrats of Ohio have selected for delegates to the Chicago Convention, Mr. Vallandigham, Governor Medary, Dr. Olds, Mr. A. M. Jackson, and Mr. A. M'Gregor, all of whom have been arrested and imprisoned by the Federal Government.

ON July 1, when the Gold Bill was repealed, and Mr. Fessenden accepted the Secretaryship of the Treasury, gold declined to 230. On the 9th inst. it was quoted at 263½.

THE TENDER MERCIES OF THE YANKEES.—The Richmond Despatch directs attention to the results of one of Mr. Lincoln's colonisation schemes. Last summer he sent 566 negroes to Hayti as colonists. Of these there are now remaining 407 persons, who have returned and are now at a place which the Federals call 'Freeman's Village.' The Despatch says: 'All that was ever written or preached of the horrors of the "Middle Passage," falls short of conveying an idea of what these poor wretches suffered, under the auspices of the humane, philanthropic, negro-loving Yankees. The New York Tribune confesses as much. While they were on the passage from Fortress Monroe outward, the small-pox broke out in the vessel. The disease soon spread, and the wretched victims, when they arrived in the West Indies, were landed on the sandy beach of an island upon which there was not a house, and there left to help themselves or perish. That they did perish in immense numbers, may be known from the fact that only 407 out of 566 returned to tell the tale. One hundred and fifty-nine died upon that inhospitable island, and left their unburied bones bleaching in the sun; a striking yet faint testimonial of the value of Yankee philanthropy, and an everlasting record of Yankee humanity. The 407 who survived, after having undergone sufferings the bare narrative of which is sufficient to curdle the blood, contrived by some means to reach Virginia. And such a spectacle never was beheld in Virginia before. The very mothers who bore them would not have recognised them, so wan, so emaciated, so unlike anything human had they become, from disease, hunger, watching, excessive labour, and every evil that is incident to the condition of man where most deplorable. They were barefooted to a man, ragged to a degree of indecent exposure, and filthy to the utter nausea of everybody who came near them.'

ENGLAND.

THE Wimbledon meeting this year has hitherto proved an immense success. The arrangements reflect the highest credit on the administration, and there has been a wonderful freedom from accidents and obstructions. The difficulties to be encountered may easily be imagined when it is known that there are no less than 2,000 competitors for the Alexandra prize alone. The weather has been magnificent for pleasure-seekers; but the sun has glared somewhat too fiercely for the comfort of the marksmen or the accuracy of the shooting. The competition for the Queen's and Alexandra prizes extended over the days of last week and a portion of the present week. The Prince of Wales prize closed on Wednesday, July 13, in favour of a Herefordshire man, one Sergeant Dodd. On Thursday the Duke of Cambridge's prize for shooting with breech-loading rifles was awarded to Mr. Edward Ross, of the University of Cambridge; a member of the Victoria Rifles being second, and a Kentish man third. All these shot with Westley Richards' breech-loader. The first carbine prize at 200 yards went to Lieutenant Hughes of the 9th Kent Artillery; a gunner of the 12th Devon being second. On Saturday the first stage of the Queen's prizes was completed; the first thirty men receiving Whitworth rifles, the next thirty 5*l.* each and badges, and the remaining forty receiving 3*l.* each and badges. The silver medal was awarded to Private Haward of the 1st Suffolk. The top score in this stage fell below that of last year, but the shooting generally was superior. The Saturday Review and Count de Gendre prizes for volley firing at 400 yards (ten men each) were decided on Saturday, and were won by the 2nd Stafford, the 1st Surrey being second, and 19th Middlesex third: Staffordshire also won the County Match. On Saturday evening the competition for the prize offered by our mysterious contemporary The Owl was commenced. The terms were that the firing should take place in the dark at the 200 pool targets. Lights called owls' eyes were to be substituted for the plates used as bullseyes. The prize was 50*l.* The only mark presented to the eye of the marksmen was a light at 200 yards' distance. On Sunday service was held in the 'umbrella tent,' and a sermon was preached by His Grace the Archbishop of York to a very numerous congregation of volunteers. On Monday the match between the Houses of Lords and Commons took place: a most distinguished company, headed by their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, were present. The champions of the Lords were, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earls of Aberdeen, Airlie, Ducie, and Elden, Earl Spencer, and Lords Bolton, Dufferin, Lismore, Suffield, and Vernon. Of these noblemen the Earl of Ducie made the highest score, namely 53 points. The champions of the Commons were Lords Bury, Grosvenor, and Elcho, Captain Wyndham, and Messrs. Talbot, Forster, Duncombe, Dillwyn, Vivian, Malcolm, and Humberston. For the Commons Lord Bury made the highest score, namely 52 points. The Lords in the result were declared the winners by 40 points. The international contest between England and Scotland, with Enfield rifles and twenty representatives of each nation, was won by England. The Duke of Devonshire and the Earl of Derby, as Chancellors of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford, gave a piece of plate of 100*l.* value to be contested by eight champions of each University. The prize was won with great ease by Cambridge. On the same day the Alexandra prizes, at 200 yards and 500 yards, were decided. The St. George's Challenge Vase went to Serjeant Penzer, of the 5th Stafford, a Derbyshire man being second, and a gentleman of Cambridge University third. On Tuesday the competition for the Queen's Prize was brought to a close, and the sum of 250*l.*, with the gold medal, went to Private Wyatt, 1st London, who defeated by one point Lieutenant-Colonel Halford, of Leicester. Much excitement was created by the Public Schools match. Eton, Harrow, Rugby, Winchester, Marlborough, and Cheltenham entered for the Ashburton Shield, won last year by Eton. Eleven champions appeared for each school. Harrow made 226 points and won, Cheltenham being next with 219, then Rugby with 205, Eton with 202, Marlborough with 185, and Winchester with 89. The Earl Spencer's Challenge Cup, offered to the best marksman in the schools, was won by Corporal Thornton, of Cheltenham College.

THE Royal Agricultural Society of England is holding its annual show at Newcastle-on-Tyne. There are to be seen those marvellous specimens of cattle, sheep, horses, and pigs to which no other country can furnish a parallel. The first prize for aged short-horned bulls was won by 'Forth,' the property of Mr. Cruickshank, of Sittytan, Aberdeenshire, but sprung of the breed which has immortalised the name of Colonel Townley. The show of short-horn cows, heifers, and calves was magnificent. The Herefords were good, but few in number. In Devons the well-known names of Mr. Farthing and Mr. Turner appear as prize-takers, while General Hoste is successful with stock from the royal farm at Windsor. In sheep, Lord Walsingham is as formidable as ever with his Southdowns, while Mr. Wallis of Farringdon wins all the prizes in Oxfordshire Downs. Leicester and Cotswolds are good and numerous, and look very tempting animals with the present rates for wool. In horses, there are ten thoroughbreds shown, but the display is far below that seen a fortnight since in London. The first prize is given to a five-year-old horse called Laughing-Stock, by Stockwell out of Gaiety. This horse ran for the Two Thousand Guineas when the victory fell to the Marquis. At that time Laughing-Stock was admired for bone and size, but success was scarcely to be expected for him on the race-course. The second prize was given to Cavendish. Buccaneer by Wild Dayrell, the property of Lord Portsmouth, a wonderful racehorse for the distance of one mile, Carbineer, and Gamester, the winner of the Doncaster St. Leger, were also shown. Clydesdales and Suffolks are excellent as ever. In all, there are 380 head of cattle, 160 horses, 400 pens of sheep, and 130 pens of swine. There are also 4,000 implements exhibited.

THE magnificent palace at Sydenham shone with more than ordinary splendour on Saturday and Monday last. The Dramatic College, the interests of which commend themselves to every man of a benignant heart, held its annual fête, and the host of accomplished actors and actresses of the metropolis lent their kind services in aid of the funds for the relief of their less fortunate brethren and sisters in the profession. Nowhere else could greater crowds, more beautiful dresses, or happier faces be seen, and fun, gaiety, and profuse expenditure held universal sway. The stalls for the sale of fancy articles, and all those curious and useless things which could never command a purchaser except at a fair of charity, were ranged in the transept, and the goods were temptingly offered in a manner that would not be denied by the fair ladies who presided over the high-priced treasures. 'Richardson's Show,' 'Wombwell's Menagerie,' and the 'Temple of Magic,' of which the wondrous Toole and Paul Bedford were the priests, attracted hundreds of visitors. Mr. Buckstone conducted an Aunt Sally with marvellous success. There was the same display on the following Monday, and a handsome sum was added to the funds of the college.

THE King of the Belgians has nominated Mr. Henry Thompson officer of the order of Leopold, and surgeon extraordinary to His Majesty. The King has also given him a fee of 4,000*l.* His Majesty has enjoyed thirteen months of uninterrupted ease and comfort since the operation performed by Mr. Thompson.

FOUR years ago a man named Thomas Hopley was tried and convicted for the manslaughter of a boy named Cancellor, whom Hopley, in the relation of master to pupil, castigated to such an extent as to cause his death. Hopley was sentenced to four years' penal servitude, but has been released under a ticket-of-leave. His wife, Fanny Hopley, last week petitioned the Divorce Court for a judicial separation on the ground of her husband's cruelty. From the evidence adduced, it appeared that the petitioner was married at the age of eighteen to Hopley, who was then thirty-six years of age. During the first four days of the marriage Hopley forbade her to share his bed, on the ground that she must go through a regular course of moral training before she could be fit to be the mother of his children. These last were to be model children—indeed, 'second Christs.' The 'happy pair' resided at Eastbourne, and Hopley drew up an elaborate code of laws, combining the penalties of Draco with the particularity of the Code Napoleon. These his wife was to read, learn, and observe, and default was punished by savage blows, the discharge of spittle in her face, and torrents of foul and abusive language. In her confinement no nurse or medical man was permitted to be present, for, as Hopley said, 'a nurse was unnecessary, and a doctor was decidedly indelicate.' However, an airing was another thing, and so the poor woman was taken out for a drive five days after the birth, while the infant was carried in a fish-basket. At the age of a fortnight the child was thought by Hopley a fit subject for chastisement, and its cries for food were answered by blows. It was placed in a hot bath, and cold water was poured on its head. The mother was prevented from suckling it. Indeed, she was unfit for everything but ill-usage; for, as Hopley says, 'she was not fit to say her prayers with him at night, for she every day flew in the face of Almighty God.' There were three children of the marriage. The treatment endured by the first child, which was an idiot, befell the second. The third escaped by the imprisonment of the unnatural father. Cruelty more resembling that of a demon or a maniac than of the vilest of reasonable men having been thus proved, it was shown on the other side that Hopley was a man of education, with majestic schemes for the improvement of the whole human race, beginning with his own people: that his pamphlets rang out a tone of sublime wisdom; that his religion was intense, his philanthropy grand. It was further proved that through all her misery that good woman had clung to him with tenacity; that after blows, abuse, hatred, malice, and neglect, she, and she alone, had stood by him, had written to him during his imprisonment in words of deep affection, had managed his affairs, had declared her love unchanged. To an ordinary mind all these facts would only go to enhance the cruelty of the man; in the eye of the law and the judge who administered the law, they constituted 'condonation;' and by his direction the jury found that the cruelty had been condoned. The petition was therefore rejected. The judge, in directing the jury, spoke of Hopley as 'a man of education and refinement, of great natural ability with a great many noble although visionary aspirations, not wanting in warm affection and in proper religious feelings, but a man whose opinions were not in harmony with the rest of the world.' To compare small things with great, we should fancy that we were reading the language of eulogy so often devoted to the champions of Abolitionism, together with the record of the method and results of their actions. Of the judge-ordinary every one must speak with deep respect, but when he told the jury that 'Fanny Hopley did not come there because she was afraid to return to her husband, but for other reasons,' he scarcely foresaw that the poor woman would, on hearing the adverse decision of the court, fly from England to avoid Hopley.

THE activity of the police, whose searches for the murderer of Mr. Briggs have been of the most sedulous description, seems likely to be rewarded. Their pursuit has been to some extent hindered by well-meant but useless information, by the vagaries of insane persons, and by the miserable and unfeeling hoaxes of practical jokers. Four days ago a little girl, the daughter of a cabman named Jonathan Matthews, found a card box, which she showed to her father. He at once recognised the name on the lid of the jeweller at whose shop the gold chain of Mr. Briggs had been exchanged, and put himself in communication with the police. On being examined before the magistrate, he deposed that he knew one Franz Müller, a native of Cologne, of the age of 25 years. Seven months ago Müller began to pay court to the deponent's sister. In October Müller admired a hat which the cabman had, and requested the latter to purchase one for him. The cabman did so. In that hat Müller often came to the cabman's house. There was a very peculiar thumb-mark on it, caused by lifting it constantly at the same place. The hat found in the railway carriage with the body of Mr. Briggs (for it is to be remembered that the murderer took the hat of his victim by mistake) was shown to the cabman, and at once identified by him as that worn by Müller. On Monday, July 11, two days after the murder, Müller visited this cabman, and displayed a watch and chain, giving the child the card box to play with. He also exhibited a ring similar to that described by the jeweller as purchased at his shop. Müller complained of having sprained his ankle in the City. He further told the cabman that he was off to Canada. The police also went to a house in Bow where Müller lodged, and found that he had returned home on the night of the murder about eleven P.M., and appeared much confused. One of the lodgers produced a pawn-ticket relating to the chain which Müller received from the jeweller and pledged in Bow. It was found on enquiry that Müller had sailed for New York in the sailing vessel Victoria on Thursday last. An inspector, accompanied by the cabman and the jeweller, and armed with a warrant and letters from Mr. Adams to the executive at New York left on Wednesday by the American Mail for New York.

INDIA.

The difficulties attending the relations between the indigo planters and the ryots are, if possible, greater than ever. The ryot can only be satisfied by concessions which would cause both the planter and the cultivation of indigo to disappear together. At the present moment fever is raging in the Jessore district, while the soil is so exhausted that no return is to be won for labour. The planter, at whose door all the misfortunes of the ryot are laid, is in no better plight. He is in debt, and sees no prospect of such prosperity as will relieve him from embarrassment. There had been expectation of an insurrection on the part of the ryots in May, but as yet the people had shown no signs of using force.

Great complaints are heard in Calcutta about the condition of the piece goods manufactured from Surat cotton. Those which have arrived overland are said to be black with mildew, while many others are absolutely rotten.

CHINA.

Details have been received of the capture of Changchow by Gordon. On May 11 he stormed the town, after a desperate fight, with the slaughter of 3,000 Taepings. A large body of Cantonese rebels was annihilated. Hoo-wang, one of the most noted leaders, was captured and beheaded. Gordon was about to return to Quinsan, whence, after closing his affairs, he will make his way home to England, in obedience to the Order in Council prohibiting British soldiers from further service in China. It was rumoured that Tanyang had fallen. Tsan-kwo-fan had resolved to reduce Nankin without the aid of Gordon. It was generally believed that no long time would elapse before the complete subjugation of the Taepings was effected.

JAPAN.

By intelligence from Japan, up to May 14, we learn that the Emperor was endeavouring, with the aid of several of the most powerful Daimios, to reduce Prince Choshiu to submission. Prince Satsuma was in command of the Imperial forces. Her Majesty's ships Conqueror and Pelorus were expected at Yokohama, to act in conjunction with two Dutch frigates, and effect the opening of the inland sea.

The Customs authorities continued to check exportation by petty and vexatious charges.

AUSTRALIA.

In the House of Assembly at Melbourne an address has been moved to his Excellency the Governor, praying him to place the sum of 5,000*l.* upon the supplementary estimates for the year, to defray the expense of retransporting to England 300 expirees. After an exciting debate the motion was withdrawn, on the assurance of the Government that all reasonable means should be employed to effect a discontinuance of transportation to Australia. A feeling of great indignation against the Home Government existed throughout the colony of Victoria, and bold men were even found ready to talk of independence in case the present policy of England remained unchanged.

The highwayman Gardener, of whose romantic acts of depredation an account was given some weeks ago in THE INDEX, was conveyed after his capture in Queensland to Sydney and tried. He was, however, acquitted, to the intense delight of the multitude assembled in the court.

NEW ZEALAND.

Details have been received of the disaster to the British arms at Tauranga. This place is the chief habitation of the Ngapuhi tribe, and to it the natives in arms had retired after their repulse at Orakau. General Cameron followed them with the 43rd and 68th and portions of the 14th and 70th regiments. The naval squadron, consisting of the Curaçoa, Esk, Miranda, Harrier, and Eclipse, accompanied the force. On the arrival of the troops at Tauranga, preparations were made for storming the Gate Pah, a fort consisting of two pahs 1,000 yards apart, but connected by a covered way, surrounded by rifle-pits and an inner line of fence masked by boughs. The 68th regiment was marched to the rear of the position during the night, and on the following day the bombardment of the place commenced with thirteen heavy guns. A breach was effected after nine hours' firing, and the storming party, consisting of equal numbers of the 43rd regiment and the naval brigade, advanced to the assault under Colonel Booth. The place was carried without opposition, and not a living soul was to be seen within. There were some things lying about, and the men fell to looting. Many threw down their arms, and all separated into groups in spite of the attempts of the officers. In a moment the natives rose as if from the bowels of the earth, and poured a deadly fire into the troops. The men of the 43rd fled in a panic, leaving behind them their officers. The sailors followed the fugitives. A second force, under Captain Hamilton of the Esk, advanced to the support, but their leader was shot dead on the parapet, and the men fell back. The 68th was also repulsed in an assault on the rear of the works. Our loss was frightful. Colonel Booth was killed, with four captains and two lieutenants of the 43rd. Only two officers were hit and not killed. Commander Hay of the Harrier, and Lieutenant Hill of the Curaçoa, were killed. In all our loss was 26 killed and 78 wounded, and the enormous proportion of officers to men killed proved how the former preferred to fall unsupported rather than retreat. The natives evacuated the pah during the night.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Much alarm has been created at the Cape by rumours of an outbreak among the Kaffir tribes. It was even said that the paramount chief, Kreli, had crossed the Bashee in force, and attacked the mounted police. The 2nd battalion of the 11th regiment and a detachment of artillery, with a battery of Armstrong guns, had started in the Valorous to East London. Rumour had, however, outstepped reality, and though Kreli had shown great irritation at the intended removal of the Tambookies from the Queenstown settlements into Transkei, he had not resorted to arms. The Governor in return desired to make a warlike demonstration. It was thought that the Tambookie question would be reconsidered.

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

THE military operations during the past week have not been of much importance. The occupation of Jutland was completed by General Falkenstein without any difficulty. As the flag of the Allies was being displayed at Skagen, the northern point of the peninsula, the Danes made an attempt to land on the coast at Aalbeck, a few miles south of the point, but were repulsed by a body of German hussars. On the 12th inst. a squadron of four German gunboats occupied the roadstead of Litz, south of the island of Sylt on the west coast of Slesvig; the Danish gunboats stationed there declined a battle. An engagement, however, took place on the 14th inst. between the two squadrons near the island of Fohr, after the refusal of Captain Hammer, Danish commandant of the latter island, to capitulate. On the night of the 17th inst. the island was captured, but Captain Hammer succeeded in escaping with a few ships.

The immediate consequence of the change of Ministry at Copenhagen has been, as was generally expected, that proposals for peace have been made. On the 11th inst. a Danish vessel came into Swinemunde under a flag of truce, bearing a request for a suspension of hostilities. At the same time Colonel Kaufmann, of the Danish army, visited the head-quarters of the Allied armies in Jutland for the same purpose. On the 14th inst. Baron Guldenkrone arrived at Berlin with a despatch from M. de Bluhme, also requesting a suspension of arms, for the purpose of treating for a longer armistice, and ultimately on the conditions of peace. This request was acceded to by the Allies, and a truce concluded which will last until the end of the present month. The negotiations for fixing a basis of peace and for the conclusion of the longer armistice will be opened immediately in Vienna between the Plenipotentiaries of Denmark, Austria, and Prussia. The visit of Prince John of Glücksburg, the brother of the King of Denmark, mentioned in our last number, has thus borne immediate fruits, although, according to strict etiquette, the mission must be said to have been unsuccessful: the King of Prussia refused to see the Prince, and Herr von Bismarck was consequently obliged to decline his official visit.

That the prospect of peace is most satisfactory in the eyes of Europe in general it would be absurd to deny. It is worth while, however, to enquire what are the conditions of the present situation, and how far they differ from the circumstances of last May. Then, a truce for a whole month was concluded between the belligerents; neutral nations were interposing their friendly offices; the Danes had still something to lose. Now a suspension of hostilities for ten days only is conceded; Europe looks on unmoved; the Danes have lost all that ever was theirs in Continental Europe, and might fairly trust to the jealousies of the great Powers for the preservation of their island independence. Yet at that time peace was not expected by any man, except perhaps Lord Russell. Now, it will indeed be a matter of surprise if the difficulties are not adjusted between the two combatants.

It is not hard to discover the reasons for this somewhat paradoxical result. Denmark was actuated at the Conference of London by an utter misappreciation of the circumstances. She thought that England, though nominally neutral, was at heart in favour of her near neighbour and kinsman; she hoped that France, though equally neutral, had a traditional affection for her, which might stand her in good stead. What was the real state of the case? England's conduct was deceptive, irritating, and pedantic; and she has finally retired sulkily behind a veil of the coldest neutrality. France began by saying and doing nothing, and has ended by selling ships to her adversaries. Thus two of the staves on which Denmark rested proved to be bruised reeds; Russia, for obvious reasons, could not move actively in the matter; Sweden was awed into quietness by the ominous stillness of the Western Powers. These considerations will show that the question now to be debated between Denmark and the Allies has been much simplified; several factors have been eliminated from both sides of the equation; a result may be arrived at with less labour and in shorter time. The proposals of which Baron von Guldenkrone was the bearer are doubtless little different in their nature from those presented by Denmark in the Conference of London, and point to an administrative union of Slesvig-Holstein within the Danish monarchy. But it is understood that the real programme of Denmark is as follows:—1. Peace to be made by the three belligerent Powers, and by them alone. 2. The basis of peace to be the relinquishment of Slesvig and Holstein. 3. The cession to be made to Austria and Prussia. 4. Austria and Prussia to retain the Duchies until the succession question is settled. We observe in this programme the absence of the following perplexing ingredients:—The question of nationalities in the Duchies; the assent of the German Confederation; the consent of the neutral Powers; and, lastly, the succession difficulty, which is only noticed in the last article in order to fix a certain point of time.

We must not omit to mention the remarkable rumours which have been borne about of late, hinting at the possibility of the solution of present difficulties by the entrance of Denmark into the German Confederation. The fact of their having been so widely circulated is the only excuse that we can offer for their mention; for assuredly no scheme was ever devised so little calculated to produce peace as that therein contained. Observe that instead of putting out of the question the difficulties on the absence of which we have now to congratulate the Danish and German diplomatists, it introduces them all in a most aggravated form; the question of nationalities would be extended from the north of Slesvig to the whole kingdom of Denmark; the assent of the German Confederation would have to be asked to a proposal notoriously most repugnant to it; the consent of France and Russia, to omit all mention of England, must be obtained to a scheme disturbing the whole system of Northern Europe; and finally, the succession difficulty would be scotched, but by no means killed. The programme which we mentioned above as probable has at least the merit of representing fairly the result of the war, since it surrenders two provinces of Denmark to their conquerors; the proposed admission of Denmark into the Confederation would represent nothing but the hungry ingenuity of a few Danish politicians.

FRANCE.

A terrible accident has happened on the Saône at Lyons, which has occasioned the loss of some thirty-five persons. The river steamer La Mouche No. 4 had started on Sunday, the 10th inst., from Perrache, with a large load of holiday-makers; its course lay up stream under the several bridges which span the river; one of these bridges is partially blocked up by a sandbank, and it was necessary to make a sharp turn across the stream to reach an artificial channel which has been cut for the use of the steamers under the right bank. The boat, which was unsteady at all times, heeled over to the right, under the combined influence of the helm and of the moving crowds of humanity heaped upon its decks; the passengers were pressed in a compact mass against the right gunwale of the vessel. Suddenly a crack was heard; the gunwale, or rather the rail which supplies its place, gave way, and the crowd fell in one block into the river. The steamer did not stop its course, but hurried away from the awful scene. It appears that the captain was among those precipitated into the water. The steerer was about to give the engineman the word to 'stop her' when he was knocked down by a frenzied passenger, and the vessel steered by him to land. The scene in the water was most appalling—a mass of heads and arms struggling in desperate efforts for safety—strong swimmers trying in vain to keep up though encumbered with the weight of drowning women, who refused to let go their hold. The captain was taken up dead, though fully able to escape. Two women were taken up with him, one of whom had clasped him round the neck, and another round the middle of the body. It was then nearly 3 P.M., and the neighbouring quays were almost deserted. Moreover, the river is embanked on each side, and small boats can only be moored at certain places, none of which were near the scene of the disaster. The result was that but little assistance could be given. A few devoted men plunged into the water, and rescued as many as they could; but when the boats at length arrived with assistance, the river had closed over its victims, and flowed on sullen and quiet. About fifty persons had fallen into the water. Of these some ten had been able to escape by swimming; four or five were recovered from drowning; the remainder were either taken up dead or remain still unfound at the bottom of the stream. The scene on the bank when the corpses began to be brought in was, of course, most distressing; mothers looking for their children, children crying for their parents, when the recovery of a body was even a consolation, and its absence added a fresh grief instead of lighting up a glimmer of hope. The corpses have been collected in the Hôtel Dieu, where they await recognition. The steersman of the vessel has been arrested, and a strict enquiry will be made, not only into the causes of the accident, but into the subsequent conduct of the steamer.

On the 15th inst., at Toulouse, an accident happened to Marshal Niel, military commandant of that district, which might have been followed by very grave consequences. The Marshal was driving a mail phaeton, when one of the horses fell, dragged him off his seat on to the ground, and broke one of his ribs. It is hoped, however, that the accident will only require a few days' repose on the part of the Marshal.

On the 5th inst., at Reilhanette, in the department of the Drôme, a man committed suicide in a manner perhaps more horrible than any which the ingenuity of a maniac has yet discovered. He had lately lost his two daughters, and had given way to an inconsolable grief; his reason was affected, and he tried to put an end to his life, but his attempt had been frustrated by the watchfulness of his wife, who from that time never suffered her vigilance to relax. On this day, unfortunately, she left him for a moment: he disappeared, and all searches for him were of no avail. At last the poor woman went to open her oven, in which she was baking at the time: judge of her horror on finding in it the body of her husband, reduced, not to ashes, but a carbonised mass retaining the human form. The wretched man had taken advantage of her momentary absence to creep into the oven, and deliberately remained there until he lost all sensation.

An international exhibition was inaugurated at Bayonne on the 10th inst., which deserves particular mention. In the first place it calls our attention to a new railroad of the greatest importance which will shortly be opened between Paris and Madrid; it is therefore singularly appropriate that the two countries should have an opportunity of exhibiting side by side their various products and manufactures, that they may both of them see the mutual advantages which an enlarged communication between the two will afford. It also enables the inhabitants of Algiers to compare their productions with those of a country similar to their own in most respects, and inhabited entirely by Europeans. In the second place, this exhibition is remarkable as a successful effort of private enterprise; the Government has hitherto monopolised these great undertakings, with a success which in a great measure made up for the dearth of individual exertions in the same line. But the Emperor has always expressed his desire to see these movements taken up by private hands, a desire which has in this case been amply fulfilled. The distinguished personages who addressed the assembly at the inaugural festival, and in particular the Prefect of the Basses Pyrénées, laid great stress on this point. He said: 'Individual enterprise is unfortunately too rare in our country. We do not make sufficient use of the intelligence, the forces, and the resources which we have received from Providence. We are willing to abandon to the State the task of conceiving and acting for us; and in so doing we mistake the views and pervert the object of government, and impede the march of progress.'

We noticed some weeks back a case which was tried before the civil tribunal of the Seine, wherein the Duc de Grammont-Caderousse prayed to be relieved from the conseil judiciaire, or committee of guardianship, to which he had been subjected by a decree of the court in 1858, on account of the extravagant manner in which he was dissipating his fortune. The prayer of the petitioner was granted in spite of the opposition of his family and the adverse opinion of the Avocat-Général. The decision has been committed to reconsideration on the appeal of two members of the Duke's family, and has now been reversed by the full court on a rehearing of the whole case. It will be remembered that the Duke pleaded that he was now rangé, and that the little indiscretions of which he might now from time to time be guilty were of an insignificant character; the court appears to differ with him on the point. We cannot help thinking of a very parallel case which occurred not long ago in England, with regard to a gentleman who has, since the refusal of the court to interfere with his peculiarities, turned coach proprietor, and then bankrupt. 'They manage these things better in France.'

The Emperor lately bestowed the title of Duc de Montmorency upon the Comte de Talleyrand-Périgord. The representatives of the house of Montmorency are extremely indignant at this assumption of their name, and have addressed a memorial to the Emperor on the subject. It appears that there is no possessor of the ancient title now alive, the last duke having died without issue in 1862. The memorialists, among whom are found many of the great names of the ancien régime—the Prince de Montmorency-Laval, the Duchesse de Mirepoix, Comte de Brissac, Duc de Rohan, Comtesse de Goutant-Biron, Duc de Luynes, Marquis de Mortemart, Comte de Bethune-Sully, Viscomte de la Rochefoucauld, &c.—do not pretend to claim the title of Duke, but insist that the name is a patronymic of their family, not a mere territorial title. This is proved by the fact that it has been invariably borne by every member of the family, female as well as male, not by the chief of the house only. The constitutional right of the Sovereign to create 'duchy-peerages' is also called in question. This complaint may be illustrated thus: Jacques Bonhomme may be made a duke, and have the title Duc de Bonhomme; or he may be a soldier and win a great victory, and be called after it Duc de Malakoff or Magenta, as the case may be; but he cannot be invested with the Duchy of Brittany or Brest without violating the constitutional law. It appears that the French peerages lost all their feudal character during the first revolution, and were only restored in 1815 as titles; but it is contended that they cannot now be created afresh in another family without reverting to the obsolete principle of feudal investiture. In the words of the counsel who drew up the memorial, 'the civil law forbids the giving of the name, and the political law the creation of the duchy.' It is further contended that the Imperial decree constituting the title, not having been published in the Moniteur or approved by the Senate, is illegal.

The Duc d'Aumale has written a 'Histoire des Princes de Condé,' and sent it to Paris for publication. It was stopped and seized by the Prefect of Police before the printing of it was completed. For this seizure the Duke has brought an action against the Prefect, which came on on the 15th inst. The action was an appeal against a decision of the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, which had declared itself incompetent to hear a charge levelled against a Government official for the execution of a superior order without the permission of the Council of State. Judgment was delivered on the 16th inst. by the Cour Impériale, confirming the decision of the inferior court. M. de Marmas, the new Procureur-Général, said on behalf of Government that the work must be considered as a 'political manœuvre,' a defence which was received most unfavourably by the audience. It is difficult to conceive how the history of France in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries can reflect in any way on a 19th century Government.

Her Imperial Highness the Princess Marie-Clotilde, wife of Prince Napoleon Jerome, gave birth to a son at 11 P.M. on the 16th inst. The Empress paid the Princess a visit at 11 o'clock on the following morning. The mother and the baby are both doing well. The latter has been baptised (preliminarily) by the names of Napoleon-Louis-Joseph-Jerome. Prince Napoleon had paid a visit to Paris, but had returned to Havre on the 15th inst., when he had made an expedition to Cherbourg and Brest on board his yacht, and was consequently for some time unaware of his good fortune.

In England, as we well know, Mr. Bass has waged a crusade against the organs and bands of our streets. In Paris an analogous feeling appears to exist, but has displayed itself in a peculiar form. A travelling tinker came before the police and gave the following evidence:—'I was sitting at work before the door of a house, and accompanying my work with a song, when an individual comes up to me and says, "Excuse me, but you sing like a peacock; you will do me the pleasure of holding your tongue." I looked at the eccentric gentleman, and said, "Oblige me by going your own way and leaving me alone." "Oh, indeed," said he, "just begin your song again, and you'll see." Not caring to obey this individual, I turn my back on him, and take up again my work and my song. Immediately I receive a box on the ear which knocks me right over; I pick myself up black and blue, and all over bruises.' Another witness confirmed this statement, and the man of acute musical sensitiveness was condemned in default to a month's imprisonment.

Marguerite Faure, a beggar of the streets of Paris, was brought up by the police charged with inveterate mendicity. On being taken to the stationhouse she was searched, and the sum of 3,240 francs in notes and gold was found on her person, the produce of her skilful begging. It was proved that she was in the habit of asking for assistance from persons much poorer than herself, and she was condemned to six months' imprisonment.

The Tribunal of Commerce of the Seine has been engaged in hearing an action brought by M. Wemyssker, owner of the Flowery Land, against six insurance companies for the recovery of 37,950 francs, in which that vessel was insured with them. The Flowery Land, as will be remembered, was piratically taken by her crew, her officers were murdered, and the vessel eventually scuttled. Five of the pirates were tried and executed in England. The tribunal decided that the underwriters, having taken upon themselves all risks of piracy and barratry, were responsible for the destruction of the vessel by the mutinous crew, when there existed no fraudulent concert or connivance on the part of the captain with the owners of the vessel, and that the companies were therefore bound to pay the sums for which they had respectively made themselves liable by their policies.

The French colonial authorities at New Caledonia have been obliged to undertake a military expedition against the natives, in order to secure an adequate protection for the French colonists. The Moniteur of the colony gives the following curious details on the habits of the aborigines:—In September 1863, the chief of the tribe Moneo ordered one of his subjects to be killed and eaten as a punishment for adultery. At the same time the second chief of the tribe was executed for the offence of having eaten human flesh. In November, Oipe Kambo, chief of Nekoue, invited the neighbouring tribes to a great feast. In the midst of the entertainment two of the guests were seized, slain in the presence of the company, roasted, and eaten. The remainder left the feast enchanted with the politeness of their host, and in no way troubled either with remorse or indigestion. Later, however, the tribe of Moneo, to whom the two victims belonged, protested. Whether their objection lay against the violation of hospitality, or against an unfair division of the tempting repast, is not quite clear; at any rate they seized and killed fifteen persons of the Nekoue tribe, twelve of whom were women. With so large a bag they could afford to be fastidious; consequently they ate the ladies only.

BELGIUM.

In the sitting of the Senate of the 13th instant, a royal decree was read closing the legislative session of 1863-4. By another decree issued on the 17th instant, the Chamber of Deputies is dissolved, and the new elections are fixed for August 11. This may be regarded as the only practicable solution of the constitutional difficulty in which the Government was placed. The King of the Belgians has paid a visit to the Emperor of the French. He was to arrive in Paris on Monday, the 19th, and proceed to Vichy on the following day for a two days' visit.

ITALY.

A committee of the House of Representatives was lately appointed to enquire into the conduct of the railways in Southern Italy, more especially with regard to the connection existing between them and certain members of the House. The report of the committee exonerates all the deputies concerned in the administration of the railways from every suspicion of corruption. It further proposes to make it a standing order of the House that no deputy shall be a member of the administration of railways enjoying State guarantees. A Bill is to be brought in by the Ministry to effect this object. Previous to the sitting of the House in which this measure was discussed, the deputies Bastoggi, Susani, and four others who were concerned in the discussion, resigned their seats. The Chamber of Deputies held their last sitting of the session on the 17th inst.

General Stackelberg, Russian Ambassador at Turin, has been transferred to Vienna. His place at Turin is filled up by M. de Kisseleff, who was lately chargé d'affaires for Russia in Rome, but was withdrawn, with his whole legation, from that city in consequence of the strictures passed by the Pope upon the conduct of Russia in Poland.

Garibaldi is about to return to Caprera from Naples. His health has not been so much benefited by the baths of Ischia as was hoped. He has difficulty in using his right arm and leg, and is generally in delicate health.

The Pope has retired to his summer villa of Castel Gondolfo. The marine canal, which has been projected to be made from Ostia to Rome, is to be executed by a Belgian company at the contract price of 32,000,000 francs.

SPAIN.

A visit is to be shortly paid by the King to the Emperor Napoleon; his Majesty is to start on August 15, as an inauguration of the New Northern Railway. This proposed visit has been commented upon very favourably by the Liberal journals, which are anxious to see the existence of a cordial alliance with France. The clerical party are equally strong in their censures upon it.

Another grievance has been added by the Spaniards to their already long list against the Peruvian Government. It appears that the despatches addressed by the Spanish Admiral Pinson to the home Government were stolen from the despatch boxes while on their way to Europe, and the Spaniards have accused the Peruvian authorities of the theft.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

BELGRADE, June 28.—The tempestuous rains which have fallen during six consecutive days have caused the greatest devastation in Servia. All the rivers have overflowed their banks, whole villages have been destroyed, and the wheat harvest, which promised so well, has been seriously injured. The maize, which has only just begun to show above ground, has suffered less. The Government of Servia has appointed a commission of three members to report on the extent of the calamity, and on the best means for alleviating it. The consular body at Belgrade has opened a subscription in aid of the families who have suffered the heaviest losses from the disaster.

Prince Couza has issued an address to his subjects informing them of the consent of the suzerain Power of Turkey, and of the guaranteeing Powers, to the reforms of his Principality.

MEXICO.

The journey of the Emperor and Empress of Mexico to their capital has been one continuous ovation. The Indians—as they are vulgarly called in perpetuation of the ancient blunder of the first discoverers of the New World, or, to speak more accurately, the native Mexicans—have assembled from all quarters to erect triumphal arches over the high roads and to salute their new Sovereign with acclamations. Many of the older tribes have exhumed from the ground, in which they have long been buried, the crowns and trophies which once belonged to their native chiefs, and have deposited them at the feet of their new Sovereigns. The Emperor left Orizaba on May 3, after having visited all the public institutions of the city—the civil and military hospitals, the college, the schools, and the prison; his affability and his earnest demeanour made a deep impression on the citizens of Orizaba, and rapidly converted their somewhat cold acceptance of the new order into an enthusiastic admiration. From Orizaba to Puebla was a two days' journey, in the course of which the travellers might admire the wonderful fertility of the country; as they advanced the surrounding villages began to show signs of a higher civilisation; the roadside houses were less far apart, the roads a trifle better kept; vultures were less common, and the deputations from the native tribes had come from a greater distance. The nopal tree, the national emblem of Mexico, was luxuriant in yellow and red flowers, and continually brought into the mind of the party the thought of the legend on which the national reverence for that tree is based. It is said that in very ancient times, before the arrival of the Aztecs in the country, it had been predicted to that tribe that they should found a great empire on the spot where they met an eagle strangling a serpent on a rock under a nopal tree. The legend has been adopted into the arms of the country, and has been quaintly turned into a prediction of the present empire, in which a prince has come from the rock of Miramar to strangle the serpent of anarchy under the nopal trees of Mexico. Puebla was in gala dress to receive its Emperor; gold and silver, velvet and silk adorned the balconies of the houses by which the procession passed; flowers were hung everywhere—in festoons, in bouquets, and in triumphal arches. The corporation presented to the Emperor the keys of the city; he received them, saying, 'I accept these keys with joy as a sign of your loyalty and fidelity; but trusting to those feelings, I return them to you, as I aspire to the possession of your hearts only.' In answer to two addresses presented to him by public bodies, the Emperor further said that he hoped by the aid of free institutions, of strict justice, and of a strong protecting law, to put the country on the path of progress. While he was proud of the beauty and importance of the city of Puebla, he grieved over the political evils which had oppressed its inhabitants. He hoped that at no very distant date the city would be connected with the ocean by a railway, and would then expand into a new vigour and a higher splendour.

PERU.

The difficulties with Spain excite the most painful interest both in Peru and Chili. The Chilian Government proposes to erect formidable batteries at the entrance of the Valparaiso roadstead. Commissioners have been appointed in Peru for the purchase of war steamers in England. Subscriptions on a large scale have been set on foot for the completion of the maritime defences.

On June 3, a Spanish gunboat under flag of truce requested leave to give despatches to the Ministers of England, France, and Chili, at Callao; but the leave was refused. The Spanish commander then declared that he wished to negotiate for a suspension of hostilities; but this overture also was declined by the Peruvian Government.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE WAR IN AMERICA.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, in the course of the discussion on the Cuba slave trade, Lord Brougham said 'he believed that in the course of the next two months events at the other side of the Atlantic would render it expedient, and if expedient desirable, for England and France to use their good offices in endeavouring to put an end to that cruel war between the North and South which every friend of humanity must deplore.'

THE STEAM RAMS.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, a vote of 222,000*l.* for the purchase of the Mersey steam rams was agreed to.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES ON RAILWAYS.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, Lord Brougham called attention to the perils incurred by persons travelling on railways, and urged that the Government should take immediate steps for public security. There ought to be a communication between the passengers and the guard. This, which was the case on all foreign railways, could easily, and at very little cost, be done on railways in this country. It was accomplished by a board running by the side of the carriages, along which the guard could pass, and hold communication with the people inside. He hoped that some course would be taken, for the public were exceedingly alarmed at the state of insecurity in which they now were, particularly that very considerable portion who passed much of their time on railways.

Earl Granville said the matter should receive the most careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

In the House of Commons, on the same evening, Mr. Gibson, in reply to Mr. B. Cochrane, said no doubt means ought to be provided to enable the passengers to communicate with the guard, but he could not promise to introduce a Bill on the subject. He said he was aware that in some parts of the Continent there were such means of communication, but he was by no means sure that the construction of our railways and of our carriages was such as to admit of the same arrangement being made in this country.

THE WAR IN NEW ZEALAND.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Arthur Mills opposed the second reading of the Bill for guaranteeing a loan for 1,000,000*l.* sterling for New Zealand. If the present war lasted till April, it would cost the taxpayers of this country not less than a million and a half of money, and we ought not to take any further burden upon ourselves. The revenue of New Zealand is 700,000*l.* per year, and, therefore, the colony ought to go into the open market and not ask an Imperial guarantee.

Mr. Gladstone said that the colony was quite able to fulfil its engagements, that it contributed to the expenses of the war, which had been approved by the Imperial Government, and that 500,000*l.* would be paid into the Imperial exchequer. After a long discussion, Lord Palmerston said that the present war in New Zealand did not originate in the land question, and no land had been taken from the natives except with their consent and by purchase. The colony is solvent, and, with the Imperial guarantee, will be able to borrow money at a much lower rate than she could without it. The House divided, and the Bill was passed by a majority of 37.

THE 'ESSAYS AND REVIEWS.'

On Friday, in the House of Lords, Lord Houghton asked whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown as to the power of Convocation to pass judgment on books published by either clergymen or laymen. His Lordship dwelt upon the case of the 'Essays and Reviews,' and contended that Convocation had no legal right to censure such a work.

The Lord Chancellor made a speech which was humorous enough to call forth a great deal of laughter. He ridiculed the Episcopal Bench, and he described the judgment of Convocation as 'a sentence so oily and so supernaceous that no one could grasp it. Like an eel, it slips through your fingers—it is simply nothing;' and concluded by saying: 'I am happy to say that in all these proceedings there is more smoke than fire. The words of condemnation are innocent and innocuous, though they do not probably proceed from a spirit that is equally harmless. As to the question of the noble Lord, after what, I trust, may be this acceptable attempt on my part to expound the law, I have only to assure the noble Lord that it is not the intention of the Government to take any further steps in the matter.'

The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London maintained that Convocation had the right to pronounce judgment on such works as the 'Essays and Reviews.' The Bishop of Oxford severely rebuked the banter of the Lord Chancellor. He said: 'I have good ground to complain of the tone of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack. If a man has no respect for himself, he ought, at all events, to respect the tribunal before which he speaks; and when the highest representative of the law of England in your Lordships' Court, upon a matter involving the liberties of the subject and the religion of the realm, and all those high truths concerning which this discussion is, can think it fitting to descend to a ribaldry in which he knows that he can safely indulge, because those to whom he addresses it will have too much respect for their character to answer him in like sort—I say that this House has ground to complain of having its high character unnecessarily injured in the sight of the people of this land by one occupying so high a position within it.'

The Lord Chancellor complained that the Bishop of Oxford had been excited and used much license of language in preferring a charge of misrepresentation.

THE CUBA SLAVE TRADE.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, Lord Brougham presented a petition from Jamaica on the subject of the Cuba slave trade. He said that a few years ago only one-nineteenth of the island of Cuba was cultivated; but since then the cultivation had greatly increased, and there had been a great importation of slaves. From 1842 to 1860 the trade had increased from 13,000 to 40,000 slaves imported annually into Cuba. The Jamaica planters complained that they could not compete with slave-grown sugar. The slave trade to Brazil had altogether ceased. Earl Russell said the entire abolition of the slave trade had not been effected. The Spanish Government expressed willingness to carry out the treaty, but did not like to oppose the strong private interests in Cuba.

THE 'SCIENCE.'

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Layard, in reply to Mr. Blake, said that the barque Science, which had been seized by the Federals some months ago at Matamoras, had been released; but the Government had not been informed whether any compensation or any damages had been awarded.

OUR RELATIONS WITH BRAZIL.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Osborne called attention to our relations with Brazil, and contended that all our difficulties arose from the Act of 1845 on the subject of the slave trade, and that Act ought to be repealed, for then Brazil would be happy to enter into a commercial treaty with us. Lord Palmerston said he should avoid the irritating topics suggested by Mr. Osborne, and that he hoped that the negotiations now being carried on through Portugal would bring about the resumption of friendly relations with Brazil.

CANADA.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Sir J. Walsh asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he would have any objection to lay upon the table of the House the despatches recently received from the Governor-General of Canada and the other Governors of our North American colonies, relative to the recent Ministerial changes and the project of a Federal union of those colonies; and whether it was his intention before the close of the Session to make any statement, or to afford any information to the House on the important legislative crisis which appeared to be impending in the constitution of those colonies.

Mr. Cardwell said that it was understood that the new Government which had been formed in Canada by the union of the two political parties intend to prepare measures for the purpose of settling the constitutional difficulties which had prevailed between the Upper and Lower provinces, by what was called the Federative principle applied to Canada itself, with provision for the future reception of the maritime provinces of the north-west territory. When these measures were passed they would, he understood, be communicated to the Home Government, but as they had not yet passed he could not give any information respecting them.

THE END OF THE SESSION.

Parliament will be prorogued at the end of next week if the public business can be completed by that time.

MR. FESSENDEN AND THE ACTUAL DEBT OF THE UNITED STATES.—The Times City Article of Tuesday (the 19th) had the following on the new Federal Secretary of the Treasury, and on the Federal debt:—'Unhappily, the chief reason for doubting his (Mr. Fessenden's) capacity consists in the fact of his having consented at this junction to accept office in any shape. If he had joined the Administration on condition that peace should be immediately concluded, there would then have been an opportunity for the exercise of wisdom to mitigate, as far as possible, the break-up already inevitable, and to lay new foundations for the future. But to provide for the continuance of the war expenditure at an annual rate equal to six times the incoming revenue is a problem which must prove just as insoluble in his case as in that of Mr. Chase, and the fact that he is prepared to attempt it argues ill for his perceptions. Yet the New York public persevere in their credulity, and still think that there is ground, not merely for hope, but confidence, provided Mr. Fessenden be allowed to dictate his own policy. At the same time, they admit a fatal fact which has long been suspected on this side, but has not until now been acknowledged in New York—namely, that the tabular statements of the Federal debt which have been from time to time circulated from official sources will be found to fall short, by "many hundreds of dollars," of the figures of the genuine total. "It is due to Mr. Fessenden," says the Journal of Commerce, "that this should be appreciated, as it will add vastly to his responsibilities."'

SWAPPING HORSES CROSSING A RIVER.—The Philadelphia Age writes: 'This classic expression of Mr. Lincoln has been used by him on two remarkable occasions. At other times, he has brought it to his aid, as illustrating the policy of his Administration. It may safely be said to be an axiom by which he is governed in his official conduct. "It is dangerous," he says, "to swap horses crossing a river." One would believe that so plain a proposition as this figure of speech covers would be a guide to his feet in all he attempts to do for the benefit of his country. But this "God-given President" has not even the merit of consistency with his own jokes. Let us see if he has ever violated his chosen and charmed aphorism. Mr. Lincoln swapped M'Dowell for M'Clellan, crossing the Potomac. He swapped M'Clellan for Burnside, crossing the Rappahannock. He swapped Burnside for Hooker, crossing the same river. He swapped Hooker for Meade, crossing the Potomac. He swapped Meade for Grant, crossing the Rapidan. He swapped Butler for Banks, crossing the Mississippi. He swapped Banks for Canby, crossing the Red River. He swapped Hunter for Gillmore, crossing Charleston Bar. He swapped Dupont for Dahlgren, before Fort Sumter. These are only a few of his swaps, which show his appreciation of his own apophthegm. But let us look at his last and greatest swap—he swapped Hamlin for Johnson, crossing the Rubicon!'

The Hartford Times, remarking upon the arrival in that city of the 10th Massachusetts regiment, Colonel Parsons, which has been in the service for three years, says—'We learn from one of the captains that they left Springfield on June 21, 1861, with 1,040 men—that 300 extra recruits were sent to them after they had been in a number of battles, making 1,340 men; that they left the entrenchments in front of Petersburg on the 30th inst. with only 217 men, and at Washington found 13 sick and wounded, making 280 that they bring back!'

LATEST FROM RICHMOND.

An English gentleman who left Richmond on the 1st inst., having a few days previously visited Petersburg, and who, passing uninterruptedly into the Federal territory, accomplished the journey between Richmond and Queenstown in the remarkably short time of sixteen days, gives the following particulars of the military situation in and round the Confederate capital:—

'The troops detached by way of the Shenandoah Valley towards Maryland consisted of the whole of Ewell's corps (late Stonewall Jackson's), under the personal command of that General, and numbered 25,000 men.

'It was believed that another and smaller detachment with heavy artillery would be, or had already been, directed towards Acquia Creek, with a view of erecting powerful batteries on the Potomac, blockading that river, and interrupting the water communication with Washington at the same time that Ewell's corps would destroy the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and thus cut the main line of communication with the capital.

'Ewell's force was considered amply strong enough to cope with any troops which the North in its present denuded condition could oppose to it, and it was believed that as soon as the offensive movement of the Confederates became developed in its true proportions, the Federal Government would recall Grant's whole army. No corps of observation which Grant might leave behind on embarking could hold its ground against a combined land and naval attack from Richmond.

'Nearly 3,000 prisoners had been brought in from Wilson's corps, so that his entire loss could not be less than between 4,000 and 5,000. He had lost all his artillery trains and stores; in fact, only just escaped total destruction. About 20 miles of the track of the Danville Railroad was destroyed by him, but as there are no important bridges on that portion of the track, the "Corps of Constructions," a corps of railway engineers and labourers specially formed for such purposes, would be able to repair the damage in less than two weeks.

'The balance of prisoners in favour of the Confederates during the Virginia campaign alone was estimated at no less than 10,000. A great portion of the prisoners are stragglers who voluntarily came into the Confederate lines and surrendered themselves. They report that in Grant's army the practice of self-mutilation has become so frequent (generally by shooting or cutting off a finger), that an order has been issued to severely punish the men so soon as their self-made wounds are healed, and to send them as labourers under guard into the trenches. Besides malarious fevers, very malignant bowel complaints, caused by the bad water and the pulverised sand with which the atmosphere is surcharged, had appeared, and threatened to become epidemic in the Federal army.

'Grant was leisurely shelling Petersburg at a distance of about two miles, but doing little damage. Communications between that city and Richmond were perfect and not in the least disturbed. No scarcity of provisions was apprehended. The army was healthy and in excellent spirits. At no time had the Confederates been more sanguine. It was generally considered that General Lee was indisputably master of the situation, and that the war could not be prolonged much beyond the present campaign.

'Previous to its adjournment on the 14th ult., the Confederate Congress had, in view of the contemplated offensive movements, issued a manifesto, chiefly, though not in express terms, addressed to the people of the North. In this the earnest desire of the Confederate States for peace is set forth in eloquent language, the war is declared to be one only of self-preservation, and all intentions of conquest or of impeding the happiness and development of the Northern States is most distinctly disclaimed.

'There was no distress, but also no excitement, in Richmond. A solemn earnestness and calm confidence pervaded all classes. The theatres had been closed. The churches were constantly open for prayer, and thronged day and night with soldiers and civilians. The houses of the wealthier citizens were so many open private hospitals, and the ladies were unremitting in their care of the sick and wounded. Mr. Davis's health was good. Foreign exchange had fallen to 1,500, but was little in demand. The prices of most commodities had declined, owing to the gradual absorption of the redundant currency by taxes and the funding system.'—Reuter's Express.

Charleston under Fire.—We quote the following from an admirable article in the current number of the Cornhill Magazine:—'It was now that, foiled at all points and smarting under his many failures, the Federal General was guilty of that barbarity which has disgraced him as a soldier. Unable to capture the forts in his immediate front, he intimated that, unless they were surrendered, he would turn the most powerful of his guns upon the city. The threat was disregarded—disbelieved in, no doubt; but after four hours of unofficial notification, received at eleven o'clock at night, General Gilmore proceeded to put his threat into execution. Not a soul in the town at that late hour was aware of what impended, excepting General Beauregard and some members of the staff; and they, seeing the notification was unsigned, returned it immediately by flag of truce, trusting to the honour and humanity of the Northern general to give sufficient time for the removal of all non-combatants. On August 21, at half-past one, A.M., I was lying on my bed in the Charleston Hotel, unable to sleep from the excessive heat, and listening to the monotonous sound of the cannonade kept up on the enemy's position from the batteries on James Island. Restless and weary of the night, I had lighted a candle in defiance of mosquitos, and sought to pass away the time with a volume of 'Les Misérables.' It happened to be the one containing the account of the battle of Waterloo; and while deeply interested in the description of the rushing squadrons of cuirassiers, I was startled by a noise that, from connection with my reading, resembled the whirr of a phantom brigade of cavalry galloping in mid-air. My first feeling was that of utter astonishment; but a crash, succeeded by a deafening explosion in the very street on which my apartment was situate, brought me with a bound into the centre of the room. Looking from the window, I saw smoke and fire issuing from a house in which were stored the drugs of the medical purveyor. A watchman was running frantically down the street, and when he reached the corner just below me, commenced striking with his staff against the curb; a signal of alarm practised amongst the Charleston police. At first, I thought a meteor had fallen; but another awful rush and whirr right over the hotel, and another explosion beyond, settled any doubts I might have had: the city was being shelled. People are not generally given to laughing under such circumstances, but I will defy any one who witnessed what I witnessed on leaving my room, not to have given way to mirth in moderation. The hotel was crowded with speculators who had been attracted to the city by the sale of some blockade cargoes, and the corridors were filled with these terrified gentlemen rushing about in the scantiest of costumes and the wildest alarm. One perspiring individual of portly dimensions was trotting to and fro with one boot on and the other in his hand, and this was nearly all the dress he could boast of. In his excitement and terror he had forgotten the number of his room from which he had hastened at the first alarm, and his distress was ludicrous to behold. Another, in a state of semi-nudity, with a portion of his garments on his arm, barked the shins of every one in his way in his efforts to drag an enormous trunk to the staircase. On reaching the hall I found a motley crowd, some of whom with the biggest of words were cursing the Federal commanders. Whirr! came another shell over the roof, and down on their faces went every man of them into tobacco-juice and cigar-ends and clattering among the spittoons. I need not say that this is a class of men from whom the Confederacy hopes nothing; on the contrary, by their extortion, practised on a suffering people, they have made themselves execrated. If a shell could have fallen in their midst and exterminated the whole race of hucksters, it would have been of great benefit to the South.

The Object of the War.—As the war began, so it has continued. The North has fought to subjugate the South if she could, to devastate it if she could not. The South has fought solely in self-defence. There has never been a moment at which she would not gladly have accepted peace; there has never been a moment at which peace was in any sense within her reach. Three times the Confederate Government has attempted to negotiate, and three times its envoys have been insolently repulsed. It has never done any act calculated, by retaliating on Northern soil the crimes and cruelties perpetrated by Northern troops in the South, to make negotiation difficult or peace unpopular. The Southern people have shown the world that their subjugation is impossible. They have maintained their independence and protected their capital against enormously superior numbers; and without sustaining a single defeat approaching the character of a disaster, they have, on half a dozen distinct occasions, inflicted a total and crushing overthrow upon the main armies of the North. With every year of the war their strength has increased and their courage has risen; their determination grows daily more stubborn and their devotion more perfect and unanimous; and, in the words of the manifesto, the world must see that such a people cannot be conquered. The hopelessness of the Northern cause is recognised by all except its most devoted partisans. At the same time, all are aware that it rests with the North alone to terminate the struggle. Victory does not increase the demands of the South, any more than defeat could reduce them. She asks only to be let alone; she wishes for nothing except the withdrawal of Northern troops from her soil and Northern cruisers from her waters. Peace, therefore, requires only that the aggressors should abandon the hope of reducing free States, inhabited by an English population, to a hateful servitude; and it ill becomes the European Powers to encourage that hope, and prolong the war, by withholding a diplomatic acknowledgment of the universal conviction that the independence of the South is virtually an accomplished fact.—The Standard, July 21.

Another Newspaper Correspondent Banished.—A letter from New York contains the following:—'The banishment of Mr. Condon, the New Orleans correspondent of the Index, I gave you about a week since. It seems he was permitted to remain in the city, however, for several days after the time specified in the order, and even this has again been changed by allowing him to remove to any foreign country. The original order banished him to Pascagnola, along with Dr. Merritt and other citizens who were suspected of 'rebel' tendencies. Condon was to leave New Orleans positively on Monday last, 6th inst. The way he was trapped, I hear, was as follows. He had been charged with writing the New Orleans letters to the Index, and Banks was determined to find out whether the charge was true or false. Accordingly he set a watch upon the letters that came to him (Condon) through the post-office. One of these, as ill luck would have it, came from the Index office, with a draft enclosed for correspondence! The letter was resealed and allowed to be delivered to Condon. He endorsed the draft and sold it; the proof was positive, and the order for his banishment at once followed. Mr. Condon had charge of the Picayune at the time that journal was seized for publishing the bogus proclamation, which fact happened most unfortunately for the paper, as it has rendered the chance of its reappearance almost hopeless. Those who write from Banks's headquarters, or under his tuition, assert that 'it will not be allowed to appear again,' but this, I apprehend, depends upon how long the usurper holds sway in the city wherein it was published.

Mr. Slidell and the Alabama.—Some of the New York papers repeat the absurd story that Captain Semmes engaged the Kearsage by direct order of Mr. Slidell. The following, which appeared in the Paris Constitutionnel shortly after the fight, gives, we believe, a correct account of Mr. Slidell's participation in the affair:—'Several journals,' says the Constitutionnel, 'enter into details, more or less exact, on the participation which Mr. Slidell is said to have had in the incident which has just taken place off Cherbourg. We are requested to state that Mr. Slidell was not aware, until the evening before the engagement, that Captain Semmes's intention was to go out to meet the Kearsage. Mr. Slidell had besides neither the right nor the desire to give any orders to the commander of the Alabama. Had he been consulted he would have probably not hesitated to incur the responsibility of giving a counsel in conformity with the nature of the particulars which he had obtained as to the respective force and conditions of the two vessels. Captain Semmes did, however, refer to his superior, that is to say, to the naval officer of the Confederate navy on service in Europe, who gave an entire adhesion to his project. We believe also that we shall not be contradicted in adding that the line of conduct followed by Captain Semmes has unreservedly the approbation of Mr. Slidell.'

The Morning Herald of the 16th says: 'We understand that the Hon. J. M. Mason had an unofficial interview with Lord Palmerston on Thursday at Cambridge House, at the introduction of Mr. Lindsay, and that the meeting was satisfactory to all parties. The withdrawal of Mr. Lindsay's motion was, it is said, the result of that interview, the Premier having given a sort of implied promise to support it at a more opportune moment; that is to say, when Grant and Sherman have been defeated, and the Confederacy stand in no need of recognition.

The Captain of the Kearsage has been raised to the rank of commodore for sinking the Alabama. The telegram which announces this says, 'regrets are expressed that the Deerhound was not also sunk for rescuing Captain Semmes.'

How General Longstreet was Wounded.—The Times Richmond correspondent gives the following interesting account: 'Upon the same plank road which on May 2, 1863, witnessed the death-wound of Stonewall Jackson, General Longstreet, dangerously struck in the throat by a Southern bullet, escaped death upon May 6, 1864, although receiving, after three years of unparalleled exposure, his first hazardous wound. You will have learnt that upon the previous day two Confederate divisions—those of Heth and Wilcox—held their ground long and nobly against overwhelming numbers of their foe. They were to be relieved in the night; and the men, worn down by exertion, looked for a brief repose as they scanned their thin numbers, when, before the dawn of May 6, heavy lines of the enemy, massed in the night, and following each other in quick succession, dashed upon their enfeebled ranks. They stood gallantly for a while; but at last, shrinking before the compact masses hurled upon them, they commenced a retreat, which from a walk grew into a run, from a run into a demoralized rout. At this moment there was advancing along the plank road the hardy corps which Longstreet has so long led. Into their leading files dashed, at headlong speed and in wild disarray, the broken ranks of Heth and Wilcox, mingled with field-pieces, ambulances, caissons, runaway horses, and shouting officers striving to bear up against the rout, but whirled along in its resistless current. Beside the road was General Lee, irritated and excited beyond precedent, and eager to stem the torrent of fight by catching hold of any organised body of men and launching them in person against the head of the advancing stream. Upon this hurly-burly of confusion and alarm supervened at the most critical moment the unshrinking constancy of General Longstreet and his corps. Riding up to General Lee, he said, "General, my men have seen such scenes before, and will not be daunted; wait, and you shall see the enemy driven like chaff before the wind." Right nobly did his men, and especially Kershaw's division, verify their General's confident promise. The onward rush of Federals was stayed; at their head fell General Wadsworth, gallantly yielding his life for what he believed the holiest of causes; the Confederates swept forward irresistibly, and the ground on which Heth and Willcox had bivouacked passed again into their hands. At this moment, Longstreet, after brief consultation with General Lee, suggested a flank movement not dissimilar to that by which twelve months before the bloody day of Chancellorsville was decided by Jackson. It was commenced, the promise of the first movement was richly encouraging. Generals Longstreet and Jenkins rode in great glee with their Staff along the plank road, when one of those unforeseen accidents which are inseparable from war, and doubly hazardous with undisciplined troops, checked in an instant all laughter and merriment. A volley at short range, issuing from Mahone's brigade of Confederates as they poured obliquely through the tangled undergrowth of the Wilderness, struck Longstreet's little party like a white squall; General Jenkins sprang high from his saddle and fell dead with a bullet through his brain; Longstreet himself lay stretched in the road pulseless and inanimate, and, as all thought, with but few minutes of life left in him. Instantly the flank movement was arrested. About an hour later, Longstreet, awaking from his swoon, exclaimed to Dr. Cullen, "In another half hour, but for my wound, there would not have been a Yankee regiment standing and unbroken on the south of the Rapidan."

The Attack on the Lily.—The following extract from a letter, dated Havannah, June 24, gives an account of the attack made by a Federal vessel on Her Majesty's ship Lily, at Galveston. The writer was on board the English vessel at the time:—'We left Matamoras at 1 P.M., June 9, for Galveston, en route for Bermuda, to join the Commander-in-Chief, leaving the Shannon at Matamoras and the Rinaldo going to Tampico and Vera Cruz. Most glad we all were to leave the Gulf of Mexico for the North. On the morning of the 11th, running in for Galveston, we observed a steamer standing out from the land, but a squall coming on, we lost sight of her for half an hour. The weather clearing up, we saw three steamers steering for us under United States' colours. We had our English blue ensign and pendant flying, and as they neared us we eased our engines to communicate if they wished, as we did the last time we visited this place. Finding they took up positions on our bow, beam, and quarter (their men at quarters cleared for action, and guns bearing on our ship), and not appearing anxious to speak us, we proceeded under full speed together for Galveston bar, about eight miles distant. Shortly after the gun-vessel on our starboard quarter fired a shotted gun to leeward and then another across our bows. We eased engines to allow her to come on our beam, and, finding still they did not hail us, we said, 'This is Her Britannic Majesty's ship Lily, wishing to communicate with the senior officer of the United States blockading squadron off Galveston.' In reply to our hail she answered, 'This is the United States ship Princess Royal. I will show you the way in.' We then proceeded in company with the three-gun vessel for Galveston. After we anchored the captain communicated with the senior officer of the blockading squadron, demanding an explanation of his conduct in firing a shotted gun across the bows of a British ship-of-war, that nation being at peace with the United States. The captain of the United States' ship Princess Royal came on board, and remained an hour with our captain. In the afternoon he sent his reply, which I believe was very courteous, solemnly disavowing any and all intention of insulting the flag of Her Britannic Majesty. It all occurred through their fully believing us to be the Confederate vessel Florida, now cruising in the West Indies, and the commander of the Princess Royal not being aware we had the Lily class of vessel in our service. As the Florida had run through their blockading squadron at Mobile under the English flag and precisely similar circumstance, he hardly knew what to do, so he fired to bring us to; but he should have hailed us first, as he was not more than 150 yards distant. We are not surprised at it, as every vessel we have boarded has taken us for the Florida, and every person who has seen both ships says we are sister vessels in hull and appearance. I have no doubt that when this comes before their Lordships we shall be transferred to another station, to prevent these unpleasant mistakes occurring.'

An Unfortunate Actor.—The Northern papers say: 'An actor named Hamilton has been convicted at St. Louis of persistent avowals of rebel sympathy, and sent to Alton to remain five years, one year of which he is to wear a chain and ball. The court sentenced him to wear a chain and ball for five years, but General Rosecrans remitted that part of the sentence for four years.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

The Invasion of the Northern States.

ONCE more Washington is threatened and Baltimore is in danger. The news from America might be summed up in these sentences. After three years of war, waged on an unprecedented scale of prodigality in regard to life and treasure, the Administration of Mr. LINCOLN, which has aspired to conquer and subjugate a nation of free men, is again compelled to summon the militia of the Northern States to defend their capital. It is a fact, which we recommend to the notice of the noisy advocates of 'oppressed nationalities' in this country, that the armed battalions of the Confederacy, which has so often been declared to be exhausted and broken up, were, a week ago, within four days' march of Washington, with nothing but raw Pennsylvanian reserves to resist the tide of invasion. The strength of the Confederate troops may reach 50,000 men, or even half that number; but the numbers will not alter the significance of the fact. General GRANT began his campaign with upwards of 150,000 soldiers. After his earliest reverses he filled up his ranks with 25,000 veterans; and to these were added a large proportion of the 100 days' men who volunteered for further service. He is now supposed to be besieging Petersburg, erecting heavy batteries, and preparing for a renewal of the assaults which have already cost him so dearly. The whole strength of his army is concentrated round the lines of this entrenched camp—for so it may be described—and should he take it the success could only be achieved at a cost of life utterly disproportionate to the result. The capture of Petersburg would still leave the heights on the north bank of the Appomattox to be stormed; and between that river and Richmond every half mile would present a fresh and more formidable obstacle to the advancing army. And while GRANT is amusing himself with the spade, and bringing up his siege artillery, LEE, confident in the strength of his position, has spared one whole corps d'armée, possibly two, for the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania. General LEE throughout this terrible war has never been charged with rashness. We may rely upon it that, if he has despatched 30,000 or 50,000 men into Northern territory, he feels safe from GRANT'S army. What, then, are we to think of the chances of the latter when his skilful opponent deliberately leaves him to do his worst, and transfers the struggle from the wasted counties of Virginia to the rich plains of Maryland and Pennsylvania?

There is good reason to believe that General LEE has for some time past contemplated this movement. Weeks have elapsed since we heard that EWELL'S corps had suddenly disappeared from the front of GRANT'S lines on the Chickahominy. In all probability, the advance was decided upon so soon as GRANT'S direct line of communication with Washington was interrupted, and the pursuit of Hunter's corps was merely an accident. The intention, doubtless, was to sweep away every Federal soldier from the Shenandoah, and crush any army that ventured to oppose the march. HUNTER'S partial success may have impeded—it certainly did not hurry on—EWELL'S movement. But nobody could have played the Confederate game better than the General who, advancing with his base in the air down the Shenandoah valley upon Lynchburg, retreated when attacked in exactly the opposite direction to that in which alone his army might have been available for the defence of the Northern frontier. It is possible that HUNTER had no other alternative, and that only his rapid march to Gauley, Western Virginia, saved his force from destruction. But under any circumstances he has succeeded in neutralising an army of veterans which at the present time would be of immense service to the North, and but for his glaring bad generalship the invasion of the North would have been a far more critical undertaking. It would seem that the defence of Lynchburg was entirely the work of the small body of Confederates who fought at Stanton under General JONES; and that EWELL, leaving Lynchburg to its fate, marched directly upon the Shenandoah valley, with a view of cutting off HUNTER from his communications, and occupying the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. In both objects he has succeeded. HUNTER is isolated and powerless to strike a blow; and long before he can be in a position to make any serious demonstration in EWELL'S rear, the mischief will have been done. Moreover, there can be no reinforcements from the Western States, and Baltimore and Washington must depend for their safety on their undrilled militia. The question is, whether this movement is a mere raiding expedition, or a counterstroke against GRANT'S plan of campaign; although in neither case does it leave any doubt as to the issue of the struggle before Richmond. The gathering up of the rich harvest of the Shenandoah, of the great depôts along the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and of the large stores in Maryland, would be no slight gain to LEE; but we are inclined to think that something more than a mere raid is intended, and that the object is to compel GRANT'S withdrawal of his army for the protection of the menaced cities of Maryland and Pennsylvania. The moment is singularly propitious for such a coup. There are not now any real soldiers north of MASON'S and DIXON'S line. Every man fit to march with a regiment has long ago been drafted off to GRANT. There is nothing but a badly-trained, ill-armed, and badly-officered mob of militia regiments to arrest the progress of the Confederates; and if EWELL has 50,000 veterans under his command, then Baltimore and Washington are in danger. The accounts are of course conflicting. At one moment the Northern newspapers describe the invasion as a mere border foray; the next they are full of terror at the formidable muster of the invaders, and picture two or three whole corps marching upon the capital. A few days will remove all uncertainty. For the present it seems to us that General LEE is on the eve of a movement which will surpass in importance, and in its results, any previous operation of the war.

GRANT'S inactivity is, in itself, ominous. We hear of siege guns being mounted, and of preparations for a fresh assault; but the truth is that the Federal General is nonplussed. There are no more flank movements to be made. There is little prospect of a successful assault. The only thing left is to shell the town, and amuse the Northern people by a repetition of the siege of Charleston. This in all probability will be the end of the operations before Petersburg. How much longer the Federal army will remain in its present position depends much more on the issue of the expedition under EWELL than the plans of General GRANT. For the time the interest of the war centres in the movements of the Confederate troops north of the Potomac. The position of SHERMAN'S and even of GRANT'S army is a matter of secondary importance. If it shall turn out that the fears of the Northerners have not magnified the strength of the invading armies, President LINCOLN'S Adminstration may yet go out amidst the execrations of the Northern people. Already there are symptoms of defiance to the Central authority. Governor SEYMOUR'S refusal to permit the departure of the New York troops at the call of the PRESIDENT may be the first act in another independence drama. There is conspiracy in Kentucky and martial law. There is Mr. VALLANDIGHAM in Ohio. It is hardly possible not to connect some of these political facts with the strategy of General LEE, and to conclude that some other purpose besides that of obtaining supplies on Northern soil, has dictated the renewed invasion of the Northern States by the Confederate armies.

The 'Aberdeen Act.'

THE flagging interest of the expiring session has been rather unexpectedly enlivened by a sharp discussion not devoid of episodical piquancy and suggestive contrasts. Last Tuesday week, in reply to a question, which reads suspiciously like a prearranged affair, Lord PALMERSTON delivered himself of a brief but excessively bitter diatribe against Brazil. That country, he said, had acted with the greatest neglect and bad faith towards the negroes captured on slave-trading vessels, who, by express treaty stipulations, were entitled to their freedom. He sarcastically enumerated a list of twenty judicial and administrative forms, through which the unfortunate emancipado, after a so-called apprenticeship of fourteen years, must still run the gauntlet before becoming entitled to a very dubious and qualified 'freedom,' the chief feature of which appears to be banishment under police surveillance. The point of the noble Lord's sarcastic humour was, however, subsequently broken off by the discovery, that though he quoted the twenty-headed document from a despatch of HER MAJESTY'S diplomatic agent, and the despatch gave the authority of a Brazilian newspaper, the newspaper only meant a pleasant bit of satire on the delays of justice; the document was not more genuine than 'Mr. MALLORY'S Report' in the New York Sun, which likewise deceived HER MAJESTY'S diplomatists and Ministers, and 'of about as much authority,' it was stated in the course of the debate, 'as Punch's Essence of Parliament.'

However, this little vagary of the noble PREMIER'S served to set the ball in motion for a remarkably discursive and excursive conversation, which was resumed again last Monday in the House, taken up in the Lords, and which, upon the whole, is more delightfully spiced with personality than perhaps any of the session. The gist, or at least the pivot of the discussion, was the so-called ABERDEEN Act, passed in 1845, authorising British cruisers to seize suspected Brazilian vessels and try them in British prize-courts. This Act was denounced by the friends of Brazil and of fair dealing, upon high authority, including even that of its author, as an infraction of international law. It was proved that Lord ABERDEEN himself, after whom the Act is named, had officially pledged himself to its speedy repeal as soon as its object, the suppression of the African slave trade, was accomplished. It could not be denied by the other side, that Brazil had in good faith and for many years put an effectual stop to that traffic; while Spain, though constantly guilty of conniving at it, had never been insulted by the assumption of any such high-handed jurisdiction over her flag. Still Lord PALMERSTON vehemently declared, and in terms quite the reverse of courteous to the Brazilian Government and people, that the repeal of the Act would be tantamount to the reopening the slave trade. Indeed, so wrought were his feelings by the picture he conjured up before his own mind, that he seemed to suspect all the world of a gigantic conspiracy against England to revive the horrors of the middle passage, and even accused France of having quite recently carried it on under another name, and being bribed off from the enterprise only by the permission to export coolies from India. In fact, he entirely lost his temper, called Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD ignorant, tossed (according to the Times report) a paper across the table at Lord J. MANNERS, and broadly hinted at Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE being in the pay of the Brazilian Government.

But the most curious feature of the debate—if debate can be called what ranged, without any particular reference to the subject-matter, over the sin of slavery, the Ashantee war, the horrors of the middle passage, the speed of English cruisers, the moral aptitudes of the negroes, the vital statistics of Brazil, and the duty on sugar—was the fact that Mr. JOHN BRIGHT stood forward as the friend of a 'Slave Power.' Notwithstanding the emphatic declaration of Lord PALMERSTON that it would be equivalent to the reopening of the slave trade, and retard the cause of emancipation, Mr. BRIGHT held out firmly for the repeal of the ABERDEEN Act, which he declared to be the main obstacle to renewing friendly relations with a country whose commerce was of such vast importance. Considering that Mr. BRIGHT bases his almost frantic hostility to the Southern States upon his abhorrence of slavery—that, if they must be condemned on that account, his present clients deserve the same condemnation with immensely increased severity—that the Southerners are Republicans, for which form of government Mr. BRIGHT professes a special preference, while the Brazilians are monarchists—that finally the commerce of the South is at the least four times as much worth as that of Brazil—we cannot but wonder at an inconsistency which is either in the one form heroically self-sacrificing, or in the other strangely suspicious. We must, however, in this instance, accord Mr. BRIGHT the credit of having been for once right, and, if in other respects inconsistent, to have at least been consistent with the non-intervention philosophy of his school, almost the only time when it accords with the philosophy of common sense and common justice. Brazil has been outrageously ill-treated by Great Britain, a fact that can alone explain upon a well-known principle of human nature the spleen which is vented upon her by Her Majesty's Ministers. The repeal of an Act which has no longer even the poor plea of expediency, and which insults her dignity and self-respect as an independent Power, would be no more than a meet reparation for injuries done in the abuse of her weakness. Let British merchants beware. Heretofore they have had almost a monopoly of a valuable trade, strikingly so as against their most energetic competitors, the Yankees. When peace comes these will not be slow to profit by the laches of Great Britain to retrieve in Brazil their losses nearer home. Already France, by a vigorous prosecution of South Atlantic steam navigation enterprise, is casting covetous eyes in the same direction.

In the two chief points upon which this curious Parliamentary episode turns, we are perfectly disinterested judges. These two points are the empire of Brazil and the African slave trade, and we seldom trespass needlessly the bounds we have set ourselves pending the American war. As for Brazil, her conduct during that war has been marked by a subserviency to Yankee dictation, all the more ignoble because it seemed spontaneous and eager. Even weakness has its dignity when yielding to force; but weakness becomes contemptible when it fawns, and this has been the attitude of Brazil toward the United States. We have, therefore, for Brazil no other sympathies than those that are due to a feeble nation which is bullied by a strong one, for between her and Great Britain the balance of offences is decidedly on the side of the Power which could commit them with impunity. Another title to the respect of European Governments she has, notwithstanding many shortcomings, in being the most orderly, the best governed, and the most thriving country on the South American continent; and in the even tenor of her peaceful development she need not envy the Anglo-Saxon communities in the more temperate latitudes of the Western hemisphere. Every blow, therefore, struck at her, is aimed at civilisation in a quarter of the globe where civilising influences are much needed.

So much for one of the points which have tempted us beyond our usual sphere. As for the other, the African slave trade, we are, if possible, even more disinterested. No country with her face to the sea has her hands so clean of that traffic as the Confederate States of America. If we are to believe Lord Palmerston, France is more likely to be tempted by its profits than they are. Opposing it with all their might when colonies, anticipating by local legislation its prospective prohibition when States of a powerful Union, these great slave-holding communities have not for fifty years had 200 Africans landed on their coasts, and even this small number in a period of unparalleled political excitement, as a species of bravado (rigidly punished by local juries), and not for purposes of gain. We do not claim for the Southerners any special merit in this. It has so happened, from the peculiar circumstances in which they cultivate the soil and their exceptional social fabric, that among them, besides the sentiment of abhorrence for the traffic which they share with European communities, the interests of the whole class of landed proprietors are concerned in its prevention. There is interest, therefore, as well as feeling, in the bitter opposition with which the isolated suggestions of ultra minds have ever been met at the South.

Leaving aside, then, Brazil and the phantom of the African slave trade, there is still one point in the 'Aberdeen Act' discussions which should not be overlooked. The phrase dropped from Lord Palmerston's lips in these very words, 'that the end was so good as in this case to justify the means.' Here is the root and beginning of all the fanaticism which has entailed such untold miseries upon the world at all times, and which is the curse of America at present. The moment we adopt this maxim, either as individuals or as nations, we abandon the immutable principles of right and wrong which God has set for us as a compass, and we are tossed about in the vagaries of a 'higher law,' which is, in truth, only the treacherous voice of our own passions. So soon as we do wrong that good may come of it, we arrogate to ourselves the infallibility of Providence, and even our virtues turn to crimes. The error is all the more fatal, because great human societies are never led into conscious wrong by sordid or selfish impulses; and when they assume to slay with the sword of Gideon, it is always in the name of some sacred abstraction, such as religion, liberty, or human progress. Other ages have had their crusades against infidels and heretics, their jacqueries, and their French revolution. Our fanaticism is directed against the slaveholder. History alone should teach us a modest distrust in the infallibility of our judgment; but those who have had the practical experience, as we have had, of comparing the reality which is assailed with the delusion that assails, may well tremble at the frightful wrong that can be done in the belief of right, and under the perfidious excuse that 'the end is so good as to justify the means.'

But, it will be objected, ought nations then to follow the abject teachings of the Manchester school? Ought no generous impulse ever to move them to assist right against might? So much as has of late been said about England's duty as a great Power and her duty to herself, it is astonishing that the clear line of demarcation has so seldom been intelligibly drawn. The moral rules of a nation's conduct toward others are not unlike those which individuals recognise. To be just to others, at whatever cost and at whatever apparent loss of immediate interest; to keep faith to treaties, which are the promises of nations; in one word, to fulfil the obligations imposed by our position, is as much the duty of nations as of individuals, and these obligations are always proportionate to the power which the position gives. But it is not of the number of these obligations to run a muck against all ideas or institutions which are not our own, or which shock our moral convictions. Injustice is not the less unjust because practised on one we believe guilty; and the grossest injustice one nation can practise upon another is to interfere by force in its internal government, and the free development of its social and political institutions. No amount of philanthropy can justify an 'Aberdeen Act,' and cant only makes hideous what otherwise might be a pardonable error. It is in this respect again with nations as with individuals. The people which sets itself up as the appointed censor and legislator of all mankind is generally apt to neglect nearer and plainer dictates of duty, just as the tender-hearted lady, who weeps over the sufferings of the Hottentots and sends flannel-shirts to them, has generally no time for her own children, and is hard to the poor.

Confederate Views of Mediation.

Lord Palmerston received at Cambridge House, on Friday last, a number of noblemen, clergymen, members of Parliament, and other distinguished and influential gentlemen, forming a deputation of the Society for obtaining the cessation of hostilities in America. The deputation had no party complexion whatever, and may be taken as a not unfair representation of the classes which, in this country at least, give tone to public opinion. Its business was to urge upon the head of Her Majesty's Government the hopelessness and the wickedness of the Federal attempt to subjugate a free people of English tongue and lineage, and to appeal to him, in the name of Christianity and civilisation, to exert the moral influence of a great nation in the threatened interests of both. So earnest and spontaneous an expression of genuine English feeling is in itself a valuable fact, honourable to the authors, gratifying to the Confederates, and a well-meant, though we fear unheeded, warning to those whom passion hurries to inevitable ruin. Viewed in this light, the only object which the deputation could have had is accomplished; and it matters little that the Premier should give the vague and evasive reply usual on such occasions. Lord Palmerston's reply, however, was something more and something less than the stereotyped formula. It would have been easy for him to clothe official reticence in a few generous words of the old British ring, and, without committing the Minister, do himself justice as a man. He did not choose to do so; but he proved incontestably to his visitors that, though he has been charged with forgetting the vigour of his prime, he can in old age remember the lessons of his childhood, by telling them that

> They who in quarrels interpose
> Will often wipe a bloody nose—('laughter')—

a quotation which, in the mouth of the Prime Minister of the British empire, and on such an occasion, must be admitted as not altogether unworthy of Abraham Lincoln himself.

We will not, however, quarrel for a harmless joke with a man who, despite his affectation of levity in the conduct of grave affairs of state, has left a broad mark on the page of contemporaneous history; and besides, Viscount Palmerston is no enemy of the South, and certainly no admiring friend of the Yankees. Our topic is the offer of mediation—the suggestion of which has of late been renewed in many quarters—and the Confederate view of that suggestion.

The Society whose deputation was so jauntily dismissed at Cambridge House last Friday, does not, as we understand the objects of its formation, propose to advise the Government as to any form of action to be adopted in the American quarrel. This it is willing to leave to the wisdom and discretion of those in whose hands is placed the responsibility of wielding the moral and material power of a great empire. It contents itself in cultivating and giving voice to the sense of Christian duty which must be painfully felt in a humane and God-fearing community on beholding the sufferings and miseries of vast numbers of fellowmen. It professes no foregone partisanship between the North and the South, but treats both with the charity due to members of a common family. It is purely English, and has no affiliation or connection with the Confederate States as a political body. In this modest and yet noble sphere of action its labours have been of inestimable value. It has collected from every class and every part of the country precious testimonies that the English people are not the callous, selfish race which, through their Government, they so often appear to be in the eyes of the world. It has, we believe, enrolled in its numbers the greater part of the clergy of the Church of England. It has placed itself in communication with honest peace-loving men in the Northern States of America. In brief, it has sown seeds of brotherly feeling wherever the faintest hope existed of their taking root, and has fostered the growth with indefatigable care. Such a society may not produce what superficial men would call really practical results, but its work will nevertheless be widely and permanently felt. Even the apparent indefiniteness of its objects—that is to say, the fact that it does not assume to direct the action of statesmen, but simply to generate motive power—invites the support of a large body of persons, whose tastes or professions hold them aloof from practical politics. The Society, therefore, is prepared to welcome and gladly second any measures tending to peace; but, if its members have a preference, it appears decidedly to be in favour of mediation, which they deem—erroneously, as we think—at once milder and more efficacious.

The same idea is expressed in a more tangible form in the motion which Mr. Lindsay some time since placed on the notice paper of the House of Commons, and which the absorbing nature of European events has so often crowded aside, that its author will most probably think it best to abandon it for this session. To the terms of this motion, worded very much in the spirit of the Society of which we have spoken, no rational man could possibly object; and, individually polled, it seems beyond doubt that almost every member of the House would give his ready assent to it. Voting amid the responsibilities, the timidities, and the hesitations of public and party questions, immediately after a crisis which left Parliament prostrate, at the end of the session, and in an empty house, the same members may take a different view of Mr. Lindsay's motion, and thus cause its chances of success to depend neither on its own merits, nor on the abstract convictions of the legislature.

But as the idea of mediation has acquired a certain prominence in the minds of the most devoted English friends of the South, to the exclusion of the far more important idea of recognition, it may be well to restore each to its proper position by remarking that mediation is exclusively an English, and not at all a Confederate idea. In not one of the leading newspapers of the South, in not one of its State papers, can we trace its origin; and though it is respectfully accepted when the suggestion comes from abroad, it is rather in the hope that it might be the first of other more decisive steps, than from any sanguine faith in its inherent efficacy. The Confederate position we hold to be this. The Confederate States claim as a right, in virtue of having fulfilled the most onerous conditions which could be exacted even from rebels, the official recognition of that independent existence which they legally possessed before the war, and which they have practically vindicated during three years of invasion. They claim that, in withholding this recognition of what is true in theory and in fact, the Powers of Europe, with England at their head, do recognise what is true neither in theory nor in fact, but what is, on the contrary, a monstrous falsehood—namely, that the President and Congress at Washington are either de facto or de jure the Government of the Confederate States. They claim that, in thus substituting a fiction for a fact, and admitting the pretensions of the North, they justify its aggressions upon the prescriptive liberties of the South, they become a party to the quarrel by prejudging the cause of the latter in an adverse decision, and they are therefore guilty of a breach of neutrality, a grievous wrong, and virtual hostility. Unless it could be shown that these 'so-called' Confederate States had ever been, or ought to be, the subjects of the States now warring on them—or at least that they had ever formed provinces of a consolidated empire and are endeavouring as such to throw off

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

The Invasion of the Northern States.

ONCE more Washington is threatened and Baltimore is in danger. The news from America might be summed up in these sentences. After three years of war, waged on an unprecedented scale of prodigality in regard to life and treasure, the Administration of Mr. LINCOLN, which has aspired to conquer and subjugate a nation of free men, is again compelled to summon the militia of the Northern States to defend their capital. It is a fact, which we recommend to the notice of the noisy advocates of 'oppressed nationalities' in this country, that the armed battalions of the Confederacy, which has so often been declared to be exhausted and broken up, were, a week ago, within four days' march of Washington, with nothing but raw Pennsylvanian reserves to resist the tide of invasion. The strength of the Confederate troops may reach 50,000 men, or even half that number; but the numbers will not alter the significance of the fact. General GRANT began his campaign with upwards of 150,000 soldiers. After his earliest reverses he filled up his ranks with 25,000 veterans; and to these were added a large proportion of the 100 days' men who volunteered for further service. He is now supposed to be besieging Petersburg, erecting heavy batteries, and preparing for a renewal of the assaults which have already cost him so dearly. The whole strength of his army is concentrated round the lines of this entrenched camp—for so it may be described—and should he take it the success could only be achieved at a cost of life utterly disproportionate to the result. The capture of Petersburg would still leave the heights on the north bank of the Appomattox to be stormed; and between that river and Richmond every half mile would present a fresh and more formidable obstacle to the advancing army. And while GRANT is amusing himself with the spade, and bringing up his siege artillery, LEE, confident in the strength of his position, has spared one whole corps d'armée, possibly two, for the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania. General LEE throughout this terrible war has never been charged with rashness. We may rely upon it that, if he has despatched 30,000 or 50,000 men into Northern territory, he feels safe from GRANT's army. What, then, are we to think of the chances of the latter when his skilful opponent deliberately leaves him to do his worst, and transfers the struggle from the wasted counties of Virginia to the rich plains of Maryland and Pennsylvania?

There is good reason to believe that General LEE has for some time past contemplated this movement. Weeks have elapsed since we heard that EWELL's corps had suddenly disappeared from the front of GRANT's lines on the Chickahominy. In all probability, the advance was decided upon so soon as GRANT's direct line of communication with Washington was interrupted, and the pursuit of Hunter's corps was merely an accident. The intention, doubtless, was to sweep away every Federal soldier from the Shenandoah, and crush any army that ventured to oppose the march. HUNTER's partial success may have impeded—it certainly did not hurry on—EWELL's movement. But nobody could have played the Confederate game better than the General who, advancing with his base in the air down the Shenandoah valley upon Lynchburg, retreated when attacked in exactly the opposite direction to that in which alone his army might have been available for the defence of the Northern frontier. It is possible that HUNTER had no other alternative, and that only his rapid march to Gauley, Western Virginia, saved his force from destruction. But under any circumstances he has succeeded in neutralising an army of veterans which at the present time would be of immense service to the North, and but for his glaring bad generalship the invasion of the North would have been a far more critical undertaking. It would seem that the defence of Lynchburg was entirely the work of the small body of Confederates who fought at Stanton under General JONES; and that EWELL, leaving Lynchburg to its fate, marched directly upon the Shenandoah valley, with a view of cutting off HUNTER from his communications, and occupying the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. In both objects he has succeeded. HUNTER is isolated and powerless to strike a blow; and long before he can be in a position to make any serious demonstration in EWELL's rear, the mischief will have been done. Moreover, there can be no reinforcements from the Western States, and Baltimore and Washington must depend for their safety on their undrilled militia. The question is, whether this movement is a mere raiding expedition, or a counterstroke against GRANT's plan of campaign; although in neither case does it leave any doubt as to the issue of the struggle before Richmond. The gathering up of the rich harvest of the Shenandoah, of the great depôts along the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and of the large stores in Maryland, would be no slight gain to LEE; but we are inclined to think that something more than a mere raid is intended, and that the object is to compel GRANT's withdrawal of his army for the protection of the menaced cities of Maryland and Pennsylvania. The moment is singularly propitious for such a coup. There are not now any real soldiers north of MASON's and DIXON's line. Every man fit to march with a regiment has long ago been drafted off to GRANT. There is nothing but a badly-trained, ill-armed, and badly-officered mob of militia regiments to arrest the progress of the Confederates; and if EWELL has 50,000 veterans under his command, then Baltimore and Washington are in danger. The accounts are of course conflicting. At one moment the Northern newspapers describe the invasion as a mere border foray; the next they are full of terror at the formidable muster of the invaders, and picture two or three whole corps marching upon the capital. A few days will remove all uncertainty. For the present it seems to us that General LEE is on the eve of a movement which will surpass in importance, and in its results, any previous operation of the war.

GRANT's inactivity is, in itself, ominous. We hear of siege guns being mounted, and of preparations for a fresh assault; but the truth is that the Federal General is nonplussed. There are no more flank movements to be made. There is little prospect of a successful assault. The only thing left is to shell the town, and amuse the Northern people by a repetition of the siege of Charleston. This in all probability will be the end of the operations before Petersburg. How much longer the Federal army will remain in its present position depends much more on the issue of the expedition under EWELL than the plans of General GRANT. For the time the interest of the war centres in the movements of the Confederate troops north of the Potomac. The position of SHERMAN's and even of GRANT's army is a matter of secondary importance. If it shall turn out that the fears of the Northerners have not magnified the strength of the invading armies, President LINCOLN's Adminstration may yet go out amidst the execrations of the Northern people. Already there are symptoms of defiance to the Central authority. Governor SEYMOUR's refusal to permit the departure of the New York troops at the call of the PRESIDENT may be the first act in another independence drama. There is conspiracy in Kentucky and martial law. There is Mr. VALLANDIGHAM in Ohio. It is hardly possible not to connect some of these political facts with the strategy of General LEE, and to conclude that some other purpose besides that of obtaining supplies on Northern soil, has dictated the renewed invasion of the Northern States by the Confederate armies.

The 'Aberdeen Act.'

THE flagging interest of the expiring session has been rather unexpectedly enlivened by a sharp discussion not devoid of episodical piquancy and suggestive contrasts. Last Tuesday week, in reply to a question, which reads suspiciously like a pre-arranged affair, Lord PALMERSTON delivered himself of a brief but excessively bitter diatribe against Brazil. That country, he said, had acted with the greatest neglect and bad faith towards the negroes captured on slave-trading vessels, who, by express treaty stipulations, were entitled to their freedom. He sarcastically enumerated a list of twenty judicial and administrative forms, through which the unfortunate emancipado, after a so-called apprenticeship of fourteen years, must still run the gauntlet before becoming entitled to a very dubious and qualified 'freedom,' the chief feature of which appears to be banishment under police surveillance. The point of the noble Lord's sarcastic humour was, however, subsequently broken off by the discovery, though he quoted the twenty-headed document from a despatch of HER MAJESTY's diplomatic agent, and the despatch gave the authority of a Brazilian newspaper, the newspaper only meant a pleasant bit of satire on the delays of justice; the document was more genuine than 'Mr. MALLORY's Report' in the New York Sun, which likewise deceived HER MAJESTY's diplomatists and Ministers, and 'of as much authority,' it was stated in the course of debate, 'as Punch's Essence of Parliament.'

However, this little vagary of the noble PREMIER served to set the ball in motion for a remarkably discursive and excursive conversation, which was resumed again last Monday in the House, taken up in the Lords, and which, upon the whole, is more delightfully spiced with personality than perhaps any of the session. The gist, or at least the pivot of the discussion, was the so-called ABERDEEN Act, passed in 1845, authorising British cruisers to seize suspected Brazilian vessels and try them in British prize-courts. This Act was denounced by the friends of Brazil and of fair dealing, upon high authority, including even that of its author, as an infraction of international law. It was proved that Lord ABERDEEN himself, after whom the Act is named, had officially pledged himself to its speedy repeal as soon as its object, the suppression of the African slave trade, was accomplished. It could not be denied by the other side, that Brazil had in good faith and for many years put an effectual stop to the traffic; while Spain, though constantly guilty of conniving at it, had never been insulted by the assumption of any such high-handed jurisdiction over her flag. Still Lord PALMERSTON vehemently declaimed, and in terms quite the reverse of courteous to the Brazilian Government and people, that the repeal of the Act would be tantamount to the reopening of the slave trade. Indeed, so wrought were his feelings by the picture he conjured up before his own mind, that he seemed to suspect all the world of a gigantic conspiracy against England to revive the horrors of the middle passage, and even accused France of having quite recently carried it on under another name, and being bribed off from the enterprise only by the permission to export coolies from India. The error is all the more fatal, because great human societies are never led into conscious wrong by sordid or selfish impulses; and when they assume to slay with the sword of Gideon, it is always in the name of some sacred abstraction, such as religion, liberty, or human progress. Other ages have had their crusades against infidels and heretics, their jacqueries, and their French revolution. Our fanaticism is directed against the slaveholder. History alone should teach us a modest distrust in the infallibility of our judgment; but those who have had the practical experience, as we have had, of comparing the reality which is sundered with the delusion that assails, may well tremble at the frightful wrong that can be done in the belief of right, and under the perfidious excuse that 'the end is so good as to justify the mean.'

But, it will be objected, ought nations then to follow the abject teachings of the Manchester school? Ought no generous impulse ever to move them to assist right against might? So much as has of late been said about England's duty as a great Power and her duty to herself, it is astonishing that the clear line of demarcation has so seldom been intelligibly drawn. The moral rule of a nation's conduct toward others are not unlike those which individuals recognise. To be just to others, at whatever cost and at whatever apparent loss of immediate interest; to keep faith to treaties, which are the promises of nations; in one word, to fulfil the obligations imposed by our position, is as much the duty of nations as of individuals, and these obligations are always proportionate to the power which the position gives. But it is not of the number of these obligations to run a muck against all ideas or institutions which are not our own, or which shock our moral convictions. Injustice is not the less unjust because practised on one we believe guilty; and the grossest injustice one nation can practise upon another is to interfere by force in its internal government, and the free development of its social and political institutions. No amount of philanthropy can justify an 'Aberdeen Act,' and cant only makes hideous what otherwise might be a pardonable error. It is in this respect again with nations as with individuals. The people which sets itself up as the appointed censor and legislator of all mankind is generally apt to neglect nearer and plainer dictates of duty, just as the tender-hearted lady, who weeps over the sufferings of the Hottentots and sends flannel-shirts to them, has generally no time for her own children, and is hard to the poor.

Confederate Views of Mediation.

Lord Palmerston received at Cambridge House, on Friday last, a number of noblemen, clergymen, members of Parliament, and other distinguished and influential gentlemen, forming a deputation of the Society for obtaining the cessation of hostilities in America. The deputation had no party complexion whatever, and may be taken as a not unfair representation of the classes which, in this country at least, give tone to public opinion. Its business was to urge upon the head of Her Majesty's Government the hopelessness and the wickedness of the Federal attempt to subjugate a free people of English tongue and lineage, and to appeal to him, in the name of Christianity and civilisation, to exert the moral influence of a great nation in the threatened interests of both. So earnest and spontaneous an expression of genuine English feeling is in itself a valuable fact, honourable to the authors, gratifying to the Confederates, and a well-meant, though we fear unheeded, warning to those whom passion hurries to inevitable ruin. Viewed in this light, the only object which the deputation could have had is accomplished; and it matters little that the Premier should give the vague and evasive reply usual on such occasions. Lord Palmerston's reply, however, was something more and something less than the stereotyped formula. It would have been easy for him to clothe official reticence in a few generous words of the old British ring, and, without committing the Minister, do himself justice as a man. He did not choose to do so; but he proved incontestably to his visitors that, though he has been charged with forgetting the vigour of his prime, he can in old age remember the lessons of his childhood, by telling them that

> They who in quarrels interpose
> Will often wipe a bloody nose—('laughter')—

a quotation which, in the mouth of the Prime Minister of the British empire, and on such an occasion, must be admitted as not altogether unworthy of Abraham Lincoln himself.

We will not, however, quarrel for a harmless joke with a man who, despite his affectation of levity in the conduct of grave affairs of state, has left a broad mark on the page of contemporaneous history; and besides, Viscount Palmerston is no enemy of the South, and certainly no admiring friend of the Yankees. Our topic is the offer of mediation—the suggestion of which has of late been renewed in many quarters—and the Confederate view of that suggestion.

The Society whose deputation was so jauntily dismissed at Cambridge House last Friday, does not, as we understand the object of its formation, propose to advise the Government as to any form of action to be adopted in the American quarrel. This it is willing to leave to the wisdom and discretion of those in whose hands it places the responsibility of wielding the moral and material power of a great empire. It contents itself with expressing and giving voice to the sense of Christian [illegible] which must be painfully felt in a humane and God-fearing community on beholding the [illegible] of vast numbers of [illegible]. It does not [illegible] gone partisan hip between the North and South, but treats both with the charity due to members of a common family. It is a purely [illegible], and has no affiliation or connection with the Confederate States as a political body. It [illegible] and yet noble sphere of [illegible] has been of inestimable value. It has received from every class and every part of the country precious testimonies that the [illegible] are not the callous, selfish race which [illegible] their Government, they so often appear to be in the eyes of the world. It has, we believe, [illegible] in its members the greater part of the clergy of the Church of England. It has placed itself in communion with honest peace-loving men in the Northern States of America. In brief, it has sown seeds of brotherly feeling wherever it found opportunity of their taking root, and has watched the growth with indefatigable care. Such a [illegible] may not produce what superficial [illegible] call [illegible] practical results, but its work will [illegible] be widely and permanently felt. Even the apparent indefiniteness of its object—that is to say, the fact that it does not assume to direct the [illegible] of statesmen, but simply to generate motive power—invites the support of a large body of persons, whose tastes or professions hold them aloof from practical politics. The Society, therefore, is prepared to welcome and gladly second any measure tending to peace; but, if its members have a preference, it appears decidedly to be in favour of mediation, which they deem—erroneously, as we think—at once milder and more efficacious.

The same idea is expressed in a more tangible form in the motion which Mr. Lindsay some time since placed on the notice paper of the House of Commons, and which the absorbing nature of European events has so often crowded aside, that its author will most probably think it best to abandon it for this session. To the terms of this motion, worded very much in the spirit of the Society of which we have spoken, no rational man could possibly object; and, individually polled, it seems beyond doubt that almost every member of the House would give his ready assent to it. Voting amid the responsibilities, the timidities, and the hesitations of public and party questions, immediately after a crisis which left Parliament prostrate, at the end of the session, and in an empty house, the same members may take a different view of Mr. Lindsay's motion, and thus cause its chances of success to depend neither on its own merits, nor on the abstract convictions of the legislature.

But as the idea of mediation has acquired a certain prominence in the minds of the most devoted English friends of the South, to the exclusion of the far more important idea of recognition, it may be well to restore each to its proper position by remarking that mediation is exclusively an English, and not at all a Confederate idea. In not one of the leading newspapers of the South, in not one of its State papers, can we trace its origin; and though it is respectfully accepted when the suggestion comes from abroad, it is rather in the hope that it might be the first of other more decisive steps, than from any sanguine faith in its inherent efficacy. The Confederate position we hold to be this. The Confederate States claim as a right, in virtue of having fulfilled the most onerous conditions which could be exacted even from rebels, the official recognition of that independent existence which they legally possessed before the war, and which they have practically vindicated during three years of invasion. They claim that, in withholding this recognition of what is true in theory and in fact, the Powers of Europe, with England at their head, do recognise what is true neither in theory nor in fact, but what is, on the contrary, a monstrous falsehood—namely, that the President and Congress at Washington are either de facto or de jure the Government of the Confederate States. They claim that, in thus substituting a fiction for a fact, and admitting the pretensions of the North, they justify its aggressions upon the prescriptive liberties of the South, they become a party to the quarrel by prejudging the cause of the latter in an adverse decision, and they are therefore guilty of a breach of neutrality, a grievous wrong, and virtual hostility. Unless it could be shown that these 'so-called' Confederate States had ever been, or ought to be, the subjects of the States now warring on them—or at least that they had ever formed provinces of a consolidated empire and are endeavouring as such to throw off the rightful authority of the central Government—it is difficult to conceive how their claim can be contested, and how neutrals can withhold from them what is accorded to their opponents. Yet between two belligerents, one of whom seeks to establish over the other an authority he never had, whose acts are all from the first aggressive, while those of the other are exclusively defensive, neutral Powers recognise the one as a lawful Government pursuing lawful ends, and the other they recognise also, but as an insurgent and rebel with whom all intercourse, even the most necessary, is contamination. Whenever the Confederates have asked, not for assistance or favours,—for that they have never asked—but for equal consideration with the Federals upon proof of legal and practical equality, HER MAJESTY'S Ministers have hypocritically answered them and the conscience of England, that the obligations of an impartial neutrality could not be departed from!—this 'impartial neutrality' consisting in recognising the right of a Federal Republican Legislature to legislate over States which never for an hour since it assembled were represented in it; the right of a Federal Republican President to execute these laws in States in which never for an hour since he came into office he exercised any authority except at the point of the bayonet!—this 'impartial neutrality' consisting in according to the North rights which it never had, and denying to the South the rights which it always had!

For Great Britain to offer mediation before recognition is a contradiction of terms—an absurdity which is only excusable on the plea that the circuitous road may in some cases be the safest and shortest. If Great Britain had recognised the equality of the Confederate States, if not upon the demonstration of their legal status, at least as soon as their material ability to maintain that status was demonstrated, and had then declared herself perfectly neutral or even indifferent in the contest, neither party could justly have complained of her action, and no one could have claimed mediation as her duty. The recognition of an established fact involves no responsibility for the fact itself, nor any judgment about the causes that brought about the fact. Great Britain has recognised many Governments which, in their origin and principles, she thoroughly disapproved; she has recognised alternately, in the same country, republics and empires, hating cordially both alike. Recognition is a duty which nations and Governments owe to each other by the established usages of international association. Mediation may be a duty also in some cases; but it rests upon moral rather than political considerations, and its exercise therefore is more arbitrary and capricious. Recognition is justice; mediation may be generosity; but, above all, it is necessary to be just before affecting to be generous. Great Britain offering to mediate between Federals and Confederates would be like a judge promising to be impartial between two pleaders, one of whom he had in advance pronounced guilty and the other innocent.

Let us make haste to add that, in recurring to this topic of recognition, we do not wish to reopen an argument long since exhausted, but only to place the position of the Confederate States in its proper light, and to correct an error into which some of their best friends seem likely to fall. The Confederates themselves, without waiving their lawful claim, have long since learned to trust to a higher justice than that of Cabinets, and they expect recognition only when, as one of our morning contemporaries aptly put it, 'they shall no longer need it.' Self-reliance has begot a confidence which, coupled with stern resolution, has compelled success. It was only the day before the deputation waited on Lord PALMERSTON, that he met, for the first time, the representative of the Confederacy. We have no means of knowing what passed in an unofficial interview between the PREMIER and Mr. MASON, each of whom probably met the other only from a sense that they owed it to their respective positions, and both of whom probably parted with increased mutual respect. Such meetings, if they had occurred oftener, even though it were only as private gentlemen, between the authorised representatives of the two countries, might have prevented many misunderstandings, and been productive of good to both. Very possibly, too, Lord PALMERSTON on this occasion may not have hesitated to express the kindly feelings for the South which he never disguises in private, though repressing them behind unmeaning platitudes in public. But if the conversation turned upon American affairs, and Lord PALMERSTON had asked Mr. MASON his view of suggested mediation, we venture to say that Mr. MASON would have replied that the Confederate States would give a respectful consideration to any offer prompted by a friendly motive, but that their claims upon HER MAJESTY'S Government were confined to those of simple justice, and did not extend to favours.

The Canadian Confederacy.

REPRESENTATIVE government has not worked very successfully in Canada, though better there than in the majority of our colonies, inasmuch as Canada is an older, better peopled, and more civilised country than the rest of our self-governing dependencies. She has been free from the calamity of gold fields and the curse of transportation; she has neither attracted the rowdyism of the world, nor had the ruffianism of England violently thrust upon her. She has not been afflicted with the intrusion of philanthropical meddlers, eager to revolutionise her social, industrial, and political organisation by the supreme power of the Imperial Parliament; her climate, rendering her an unsuitable field for slave labour, has saved her from the government of emancipated slaves. She has never, therefore, brought representative institutions into contempt by reproducing the follies of Victoria or the scandals of Jamaica. Her Parliament has always been respectable; her statesmen have displayed a more than creditable capacity. In every respect her legislature and administration appear to shine in comparison with those of the Northern States or of her sister colonies. But she has been perplexed by one source of trouble which might well have given rise to very serious dangers—which had no small share in bringing about that discontent to which the intrusion of Yankee sympathisers gave the aspect of rebellion—and which has ever since perplexed her rulers and vexed the souls of her statesmen. The Canadian Legislature is divided into two parties, coincident with a division of the people not so much into two parties as into two nations. Upper and Lower Canada differ in every point upon which States have been wont to fight and politicians are accustomed to quarrel—in blood, in language, in religion, in social institutions. Upper Canada is peopled by Englishmen and Scotchmen, Lower Canada by Frenchmen. The former are Protestants, the latter Catholics; and, as the natural consequences of the juxtaposition, the Protestants are not only Protestants, but Orangemen. Lower Canada, a country settled by Frenchmen in the days of the old régime, has maintained to this day many of the peculiarities of a semi-feudal society—is strongly conservative, aristocratic, and addicted to large properties and primogeniture; Upper Canada is a country of small farms owned by the farmers, in which equality of fortunes has produced social equality and democratic tendencies in politics. And matters have been so arranged that the power of these two parties in the Legislature has been almost equally balanced. The introduction of the English doctrine of self-government—i. e. government by party—into the colony, required that the Ministry should be chosen from among the majority of the Chamber; and, accordingly, the French and English parties have alternately seized the reins of office, as one or the other was placed by accident in a position of momentary advantage. 'A working majority of two' satisfied the demands of Canadian policy; and as the votes of two or three evenly divided districts varied, so did one party or the other obtain a precarious lease of power. The inconvenience of this state of things was too great not to force upon the statesmen of both sides the consideration of a remedy; and on the last change of positions in the Legislature a fusion was arrived at, which brought the leaders of both extremes into office, with a programme calculated, if successful, to do much more than merely terminate the difficulties actually experienced. The present colonial Ministry proposes nothing less than the formation of a confederacy, into which, primarily, Upper and Lower Canada are to enter as two separate members, and which is ultimately to embrace the whole of British North America.

It has been our duty, on more than one occasion, to point out the peculiar disadvantages and dangers incident to a federal as compared with a consolidated Government. And we presume, after the very thorough discussion which the subject has of late years received, that no statesman would again be likely to commit the error of the Mexicans, and voluntarily to substitute a federation for a single State. Even, however, if Canada alone were concerned, it might be a question whether the substitution of federalism for union would be, on the whole, an advantageous exchange. The danger which is incurred by forcing into close contact, and therefore into constant collision, parties like those of Canada, separated not only by religious as well as political antipathies, but also by a line of territorial demarcation, appears to exceed any advantage which a consolidation of the two provinces can afford; and it is probable that the French and English communities will be on much better terms, and in fact, for all purposes of common action and mutual support, much more closely linked together, when they are released from the bond of an artificial union which made an incongruous whole by the juxtaposition of elements which were resolved not to combine. And for the whole of British America there can be no doubt that the scheme of a confederation is one which offers advantages of the highest value from every point of view. For the minor colonies, the question is not between consolidation and federalism, but between federalism and isolation. It is not possible that the local affairs of the colonies should be satisfactorily managed by a common Parliament. The attempt would not be tolerated. The tendency of our colonies has always been to separate distant settlements combined in one nominal province rather than to unite distinct provinces together. But it may be quite possible to unite them by a federal bond of a tolerably strict character, while leaving to each province the direction of its own local business and the administration of its own finances. It will be observed that this Federation will commence its career under peculiar conditions. In the first place, the colonies have been used to a common control in one important branch of political affairs. Their foreign relations have always been, and will continue to be, directed by Great Britain; and no internal squabbles on this subject can arise in the Federal Parliament. In the next place, the colonies have all very similar interests. They are all producers of raw material, not manufacturers; and therefore there is no reason why any local jealousies should arise out of the adjustment of the tariff. They have derived from the mother-country a common system of law and judicature; and there need be no difficulty in giving to the Federal Parliament and to the Federal Courts a much wider range of authority than is enjoyed by those of the United States. In fact, it would seem perfectly possible to make the Federal authority paramount, and restrict the local authorities to merely municipal business. And this will be the easier, that the devisers of the scheme are said to intend an important departure from any system of federal institutions hitherto existing. They propose that the Federal delegation of each province shall constitute its local legislature; that the same persons shall control the municipal business of the colony and represent it in the Parliament of the Confederate colonies.

This appears to us the best, as it is certainly the most original, feature of the scheme. It is calculated to remedy some of the worst faults both of theoretical Federalism and of the actual colonial system. One of the great weaknesses of the former arises out of the jealousy between the local and general government; this can hardly have much influence where those who control the former form an important portion of the legislature which directs the latter. There will be little jealousy between a single colony and the Federal power; there can be no jealousy between the colonies collectively and the Federal power, exercised as it will be by those who constitute the legislatures of the colonies. It may be observed that the colonies will escape one of the misfortunes of the States, which belongs rather to Republicanism than to Federalism. The Colonial Confederation will be a constitutional Government, not a Republic; its head will be a Viceroy reigning and not governing; and its Administration will be subject to the control of the Federal Parliament. There will not, therefore, be any possibility of that antagonism between the Executive and the Legislature which has more than once disturbed the political balance of the United States.

Again, it is one of the worst misfortunes of the colonies, especially of the minor colonies, that men of education and character are not ambitious of a seat in the legislature of a petty colony, and thus its government falls into the hands of persons wholly unqualified and unworthy. Now a place in the Parliament of the Colonial Confederation will be a worthy object of ambition to men of the highest standing, and thus the colonies will obtain the services of these men, not only for Federal, but for municipal business. And the ministers of the Viceroy, selected as they may be from among the élite of a great population, as numerous as that of the Union in the days of WASHINGTON, will undoubtedly be men for the most part qualified to treat on equal terms with the advisers of the British Crown. We may add that the collective wealth and strength of the Confederation will be able to support a burden which hitherto has seemed too much for the separate colonies, and maintain a military organisation capable of defending the country against any force that can be brought against it by land, leaving to the mother-country little more than the burden of its defence by sea.

In every respect, therefore, this federative scheme is likely to be of advantage to the colonies themselves. How will it affect the mother-country and their neighbours?

No doubt the Confederation would be a powerful State—so powerful that it would be a dependency only during its own pleasure. But this is the case with all our colonies of pure European population. There is not one of them that England would retain by force. Nor do we think that the Confederate colonies would be less loyal than the separate colonies are now. No doubt they would feel less dependent upon our support; no doubt, if any collision occurred, the idea of breaking away from their allegiance would seem more feasible than at present. But collision between the Crown and the colonies is almost impossible. It could hardly take place on anything more important than the imposition of the royal veto on some colonial measure antagonistic to the general policy of the Empire; and it is not likely that even if this measure were one on which the colonists were strongly bent, they would for such a difference of opinion sacrifice the immense advantages which they derive from the protection of the first maritime Power in the world. On the other hand, the influence of the Confederation would serve to restrain the fractiousness of those colonies with which it is least unlikely that we should have a dispute. Newfoundland or New Brunswick might be disaffected; but the loyalty of the Confederation would be an effective check on its discontent, and the good sense of all the colonies would be our assurance against the momentary folly or perversity of any.

As an element in the future of North America, the creation of a British Confederacy is of the highest importance. The reign of manifest destiny is over, and the western continent must, like Europe, be protected against the criminal ambition of a single overgrown Power by the prudence and foresight of those who have the means to establish against it that much-abused and most necessary institution called a balance of power. The United States have played the part of PHILIP II., of LOUIS XIV., of NAPOLEON the GREAT; they have robbed and terrified their neighbours, they have overridden law and trampled liberty under foot, and openly aspired to a sort of universal monarchy of the Western world. The secession of the South was the first check to their schemes; the establishment of a Southern Confederacy effectually barred against them one, and the most promising, opening to conquest and aggrandisement. Still the South alone might not have been a sufficient barrier, and had she remained their only neighbour, they would have still been the terror and the tyrants of the New World. The erection of a stable Government by the armies of France created Mexico afresh, and placed a third Power on the northern continent of America, to assert there the existence of public law and national equality. The British Confederation will make a fourth, and close against the Yankees the way of encroachment to the northward. So hemmed in, it is not improbable that they may find destiny leading them in a direction exactly opposite to that in which they dreamt of going—that the West may break from the East, and California from both—and that room may be found on the continent of North America for at least six independent nations, all prosperous, peaceable, and content; all of them strong enough to hold their own, and none of them powerful enough to have any temptation to bully their neighbours. This may seem to Mr. BRIGHT a lamentable disappointment as compared with his own vision of one gigantic Federation, reaching from Hudson's Bay to the Isthmus of Darien; but we think that the statesmen of Europe, who know how dangerous the overgrown power of the Union had already become, and who may remember that North America contains other races besides the Anglo-Saxon, and millions of Anglo-Saxons who by no means desire to become Yankees, will be thankful to Providence for the gradual substitution of the balanced power of several independent nations in lieu of the gigantic tyranny of one overgrown empire, as the 'manifest destiny' of North America.

NEGRO TROOPS.—The Chicago Times exposes the partisan character of the attacks made upon General Sturgis by the organs of Mr. Lincoln. It remarks that Butler, Burnside, and Hooker are 'sound' upon the negro, confiscation, and other Administrative questions, and therefore lose battles with impunity; but Sturgis, being a Democrat, is removed at the first disaster. It adds:—'We can readily see good reasons for Sturgis's misfortune. He had an assorted force, made up of odds and ends of regiments, of provost guards, sections of batteries, skeleton infantry commands, and negroes. The prime cause of his failure is probably to be found in his negro troops. We have yet to learn of the first case in which an officer led negro troops and was not defeated. But twice during this war have assaults upon fortifications been successful—Fort Pillow and Plymouth—and in both cases a large portion of the garrison was made up of negroes. All negro troops have failed, and Sturgis could not make his case an exception to an inevitable rule.'

DEATH OF MR. QUINCY.—The New York papers announce the death of Mr. Josiah Quincy, in his 92nd year. The deceased was born in Boston, 1772, and graduated at Harvard in 1790. He was elected a State Senator in 1804, and was a Representative in Congress from 1805 to 1818. After filling the offices of Judge of the Municipal Court and Mayor of Boston, he became President of Harvard College in 1829, and retained that position for sixteen years. He was the author of a History of Boston, a History of Harvard College, and a Life of John Quincy Adams.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER, July 20, 1864.

It scarcely needed [illegible] the Confederates, or [illegible] the resources of the North, [illegible] cotton districts to [illegible] much vehemence to [illegible] tinued inaction of Her Majesty's [illegible] the American war. The [illegible] length therefore, to make [illegible] steady growth, and it will [illegible] ance for its prolonged [illegible].

One of the most noteworthy and [illegible] evidences of influential public opinion [illegible] given in the House of Commons [illegible] petition was presented praying that Parliament [illegible] upon the Government to take [illegible] sponsibilities as regards one of the most important [illegible] of industry in this country, and [illegible] the time had not arrived when some friendly effort [illegible] to a war that was a scandal to the age [illegible] to the world. That petition was presented not, [illegible] lieve, out of mere compliment to the petitioners [illegible] of routine duty to his constituents, by James Aspinall Turner, Esq., M.P. for this city. It was signed by upwards of [illegible] persons, including, with rare exceptions, the whole list of mercantile and manufacturing firms that have done most towards making Manchester the commercial metropolis of the [illegible]. Whatever may be Mr. Turner's own wishes and [illegible] in relation to the American war, he could have no excuse, after glancing over that immense roll of familiar names, for doubting the remarkable unanimity existing among the whole body of his influential and liberal-minded constituents, and, judging from the tone in which the hon. gentleman accepted the office of being their spokesman in Parliament, it seemed he did not undervalue either the importance of his trust or the sufficiently distinct wishes of the people from whom he received it.

A few of the names attached to the petition may not be out of place here, the rather as many of them would probably be identified with considerable interest by commercial readers in the Northern as well as Southern States: The Whitworth Ordnance Company; John Butterworth & Co., Alexander Collie & Co.; B. Whitworth & Co.; Porteus & Paul; Birley & Co.; Callender & Sons; Clarke Brothers; Daniel Lee; Rylands & Co.; M'Intosh & Co.; Lomnitz & Co.; Charles Pooley; Carlton, Walker & Co.; Davis, M'Whinnie & Co.; Samuel Fletcher & Co.; Edward Hardcastle; Ralph Waller & Co.; Magnus & Co.; J. P. Ford & Co.; George Fraser, Sons & Co.; C. H. Rickards (Chairman of the Manchester Board of Guardians); W. Pearson, Esq. (Mayor of Salford); Fallows & Keymer; C. P. Henderson & Co.; Pope Brothers; Dewhirst & Sons; Alderman Willert; Davis, Roberts & Co.; Voss & Delius; Gustavus Findeisen & Co.; M'Niven & Stenhouse; Turner, Norris & Turner; Pennington & Co.; E. Townsend & Co.; Watkin & King; Crewdson & Worthington; Melchior & Co.; Hall & Udall; Jefferis & Hellyar; &c. &c.

The petition was also signed by nearly every respectable member of the liberal professions in Manchester. The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop, upon being invited to head the ecclesiastical list with his name, scarcely contented himself with hinting at the irregularity of a member of the Upper House joining in a petition to the Lower one. His Lordship regretted he could not, in that form, give expression to his admiration of the conduct of the Confederates, and his prayers for peace. The same objection which applied in his Lordship's case would not, however, apply in that of the Dean and Chapter. Nor were the clerical signatures by any means exclusively those of ministers of the Church of England. A very large number of the Nonconformist clergy were among the petitioners, and as for the priests of the Roman Catholic Church, they have never held aloof in Manchester when anything had to be done to show sympathy with the Confederate cause. And members of the civic as well as clerical body also signed in great force. The Mayor of Manchester (J. M. Bennett, Esq.), who is well known, however, as an ardent well-wisher of the Southerners, declined, on purely official grounds, to lend the weight of his name. His worship objected to lay himself open to the charge of doing an act that might be misrepresented as a counterpart to the notorious mistake committed at the Free-Trade Hall, on New Year's eve, 1863, by his partisan predecessor, Mr. Abel Heywood. Nevertheless, many of the aldermen and councillors of the corporation signed the petition, as also did his Worship the Mayor of Salford, in his official character, and supported by nearly all the members over whose councils he presides. Taken therefore upon the whole, the Manchester petition may be accepted, for once, as an honest and undoubted expression of the manly and intelligent feeling of this city; and it is to be hoped that, before disregarding it, the Government will take the precaution to ask what Mr. Bazley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Massey have to say upon the matter.

A petition of a proportionably important character, and signed by the magistrates, gentry, merchants, manufacturers, and other inhabitants of Macclesfield, has been presented by Mr. E. C. Egerton; also a petition from Farnworth and Kersley, by the Hon. Algernon Egerton; from Bolton, by Captain W. Gray; from Glossop, by Lord Edward Howard; from Mossley, by J. Morgan Cobbett; from Burnley, by Colonel Wilson Patten; from Bury, by the Right Hon. F. Peel; from Stockport, by Mr. Watkin; from Preston, by Sir T. G. Hesketh, Bart. Petitions have also been forwarded from Ashton, Bollington, Oldham, Holmfirth, Dukinfield, Rawtenstall, Bacup, and—not unnecessarily to extend the list—from almost every other town and populous village in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire.

But a more 'demonstrative' if not more important manifestation of Southern feeling in the cotton districts took place on Monday afternoon at the Foreign Office, and the significance of the mode in which it was displayed could hardly fail of being appreciated by the Foreign Minister. On that day a number of delegates representing the factory operatives of Manchester, Salford, Stockport, Oldham, Preston, Macclesfield, and other towns in the North, had an interview by appointment with Earl Russell, for the purpose of presenting to his Lordship a memorial signed by between 90,000 and 100,000 operatives, upon the continuance of the American war as bearing upon the present and future condition of the inhabitants of the cotton districts. The deputation was introduced by J. A. Turner, Esq., M.P. for Manchester, Sir Thomas G. Hesketh, Bart., M.P. for Preston, and W. H. Hornby, Esq., M.P. for Macclesfield. Upon a portion of the document being unrolled, his Lordship proceeded to read the terms of the memorial, and, after glancing at the list of signatures, was informed, apparently to his great surprise, that the roll was 100 yards in length, and that the whole of it was [illegible] with names (three columns [illegible]).

Lord Russell [illegible] powerful [illegible] precarious and [illegible] Foreign Secretary [illegible] the people of the cotton districts [illegible] capacity for self-government [illegible] tion as an independent Power.

After listening to the deputation with earnest interest, his Lordship expressed his [illegible] tives, his sympathy with them in their [illegible] sufferings, and his earnest desire that the time [illegible] the Government might, with good effect, offer to mediate between the contending parties.

The deputation then thanked his Lordship for his courteous reception, and withdrew.

FALSE PHILANTHROPY.—The Times of July 14, in the course of a leader on the Brazilian debate in the House of Commons on July 12, observes:—'We have learnt, though we admit we have been very slow in learning, that those whom we intrust with the management of our affairs have duties towards their fellow-citizens quite as obligatory as any that they can possibly have towards any race, nation, or colour. The statesmen who are so full of the wrongs of some foreign nation or some distant tribe seldom give themselves time to consider the miseries they are inflicting upon those nearer home in the name of and in the pursuit of justice. The wrongs of the negro or of the Pole are brought before our eyes with all the vividness that minute detail and rhetorical exaggeration can give them, while the misery that war inflicts upon the Englishman, the Scotchman, and the Irishman is lost in a cold abstraction. [illegible] much of the honour of the nation, of the character of the nation, of the prestige of the nation, but very little of the sufferings which the assertion of that honour will bring on the individuals of whom the nation is made up. We cannot have a better illustration of these remarks than is afforded by the slave trade and our measures to prevent it. The nation was moved to abolish this degrading traffic by the fearful pictures which were laid before it by Mr. Wilberforce and his friends of the horrible sufferings endured by the negro during the passage from Africa. Parliament determined—and it deserves the thanks of humanity during all ages for the determination—that England would at least free herself from this foul stain. But the sentiment once aroused, could not be content to remain within the limits which reason and justice naturally assigned to it, and, having put away the accursed thing from among ourselves, our next determination was to bring the general conscience of mankind up to the standard that we had just attained, after living for so many centuries so lamentably below it. We aspired after a different kind of conversion from that to which we ourselves had just submitted. The doctrine to which we subscribed from conviction we undertook to urge upon other nations by force. We made treaties, we armed cruisers, we took upon ourselves the police of the seas. Our motives have been excellent, but there is no doubt that we have received in return for all this trouble a great amount of unpopularity and dislike; that we have not put down the shameful traffic, nor succeeded in getting it declared to be piracy; that our failures have been numerous, and our successes partial. Could an account be taken of the waste of life, of the disease that has prevailed in our settlements on the Gold Coast, of the miseries endured by the crews of the squadron employed to blockade the coast of Africa, of the vast sum of money which the maintenance of our preventive squadron costs us; could we see in one column the money, and in another column the life which this protracted struggle has wasted, we might, perhaps, be inclined to think that misery for misery, considering the greater susceptibility of the white race to sufferings which are the daily lot of a poor savage, to whom they appear as the ordinary destiny of humanity, we have done very little by all our efforts to abate the amount of human distress. There is this further consideration that we are not answerable for the negro, while our Government is deeply responsible for the fate of every subject of the Queen intrusted to its charge. We commend this principle of non-intervention to the humane of all parties, and the wise of all opinions, with the hope that, while we are reviewing our old traditions and bringing them to the test, not of sympathies and antipathies, but of sound and dispassionate reason, the question of the prevention of slavery may not escape notice as a prominent part of the present system of intermeddling in the affairs of foreign nations.'

The True Delta of New Orleans contains some interesting revelations on the treatment of the emancipated negroes. It appears that the Federal authorities have revived the system of torture for their benefit. A negro of the name of Martin Johnson was compelled to avow himself guilty of a crime which he had not committed by the use of tortures borrowed from the Inquisition. After six months his innocence was established; but the unhappy victim has had occasion to make some curious reflections on the liberality and justice of emancipation.

DEPUTATION TO LORD PALMERSTON.

A DEPUTATION from the Society for Obtaining the Cessation of Hostilities in America waited on the Premier on Friday last for the purpose of urging Her Majesty's Government to take steps to bring about peace between the belligerents.

The deputation consisted of the following noblemen and gentlemen:—The Marquis of Clanricarde, the Bishop of Chichester, Lord Alfred Churchill, M.P., Mr. Yorke, M.P., Mr. Marsh, M.P., Mr. Repton, M.P., Colonel Grey, M.P., Mr. Danby Seymour, M.P., Mr. Spence, of Liverpool, Admiral Anson, Colonel Halpin, Rev. F. W. Tremlett, Mr. J. R. Fernyhough, Mr. C. Shand, Sir Henry de Hoghton, Bart., Mr. Bramley-Moore, M.P., Mr. T. D. Tremlett, Rev. W. W. Malet, Mr. T. Ray, and Dr. Skey, F.R.S., President of the Royal College of Surgeons.

The deputation having been introduced by the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Rev. F. W. Tremlett, hon. secretary, at the request of the chairman, Admiral Anson, submitted to the Premier that from a very large number of letters which the society had received—especially from the rectors of parishes and other persons—reflecting the state of feeling in the country districts; also from the presentation to Parliament of petitions from the clergy and laity of various parishes in the counties of Yorkshire, Staffordshire, Cumberland, Lancashire, Sussex, Somersetshire, Warwickshire, Norfolk, Berkshire, Shropshire, Nottinghamshire, Kent, Wiltshire, Lincolnshire, Cornwall, Devonshire, Oxfordshire, and Middlesex; from the counties of Meath, Cavan, Leitrim, Roscommon, Antrim, Longford, Sligo, Queen's County, Waterford, Galway, Tipperary, Cork, and Dublin; and further, from the general tone of feeling and conversation in all social circles, meetings, and the public press, there were good grounds for stating that a strong and increasing feeling exists in the country that Her Majesty's Government should, if possible, avail itself of its friendly relations with the Federal authorities to bring about a cessation of hostilities in America; that, looking upon the restoration of the Union as impossible, and the independence of the Southern Confederacy as virtually a fait accompli, any prolongation of the war could only result in mutual slaughter, and in debt and weakness to both belligerents; and that, bound as both are to us by ties of blood and interest, and impressed as they must be after three years' experience with the futility of any advantage from the continuance of so gigantic and sanguinary a contest, it was reasonable to hope that such a proposal, made bonâ fide, would not only stimulate and embolden the large peace party in existence in the North, but would be generally acceptable to the majority of the people of both sections. The deputation would further represent that, besides the saving of many thousands of valuable lives, the advantages of a peace to the people of this country would be great. While the direct sufferings of the operatives in the manufacturing districts for the last three years -though borne with heroic fortitude, and met with most Christian liberality—had been of a heartrending character, and, though mitigated in intensity, still continue to be deeply felt by this deserving and industrious class, the continuance of the war was practically levying a tax in all (in the increased price of cotton and woollen goods) equal in amount to the interest on the National Debt. This war tax was oppressive to all families of small means, and was especially hard upon the poor. While wages had not increased in the rural districts, the prices of the clothing of the poor had doubled and trebled, wool having risen from 1*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.* per lb., and cotton from 6*d.* to 2*s.* and 2*s.* 6*d.* Moreover, if we turned to France, the war tax was equally oppressive there. From statements which had lately been obtained from that country, it was estimated that the people of France would have to pay this year for their cotton jackets, &c., something like 1,000,000,000 francs, or nearly treble the usual peace prices. Other countries, also, had an interest in the reestablishment of peace correspondent to the amount of cotton clothing consumed by their respective populations—which was in Belgium, as in France, 4 pounds per head, in Spain, 2½ pounds per head, while in Russia and Italy together the consumption scarcely exceeded 1 pound per head. In the United Kingdom the consumption was 9 pounds per head. The deputation would therefore submit that the Governments of France, Belgium, and Spain had a special interest in acceding to any proposals which Her Majesty's Government might in its wisdom and humanity be pleased to make tending to the reestablishment of peace between the belligerents in North America.

Mr. Spence, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Society, said the deputation was devoid of any party character, and would chiefly urge the plea of humanity. At the present moment, if to the battle-fields in Virginia and Georgia were added all the other points at which blood was being shed throughout the vast area, we should probably find that the total destruction of human life was at the rate of 10,000 a week, or half a million a year. And if to this were added the amount of woe befalling orphans, parents, and wives, the sum total of human destruction and misery was such as impelled an effort to bring it to an end. There were also grave evils that would result from a protraction of the war. The shock to the cotton trade had been endured and surmounted, but that trade was left, and now stood, in a most dangerous position. We had present prosperity, but it was based on an artificial and inflated price, and the longer the war lasted, and the wider the ramifications of our trade on this treacherous basis, the more disastrous and dangerous would be the reaction when the day for it arrived. And assuming a separation to be inevitable, it was essentially in the interests of all that each Power should command the respect of the others, and be able to take its proper part in the affairs of the world. Future peace would greatly depend on some degree of equality in power. This could not be if the war must needs go on till it ended through the exhaustion of one of the belligerents. If that exhaustion befell the South, all the old evils of the Union would return, but aggravated a hundredfold by the military power and spirit now developed. If that exhaustion befell the North, it was probable that a disruption would occur among the Northern States, a source of future discord, as destroying those relative proportions which were essential to future peace. The present period was eminently favourable to such an effort as was suggested. In the present posture of affairs the voice of Europe, calmly expressed, could not fail to have its influence. We were urged to inaction by assurances that little time would be needed. Over and over again the period of 90 days was to be final. No less than four years had now been given for this terrible experiment, and it had been tried in vain. The question now before the North was whether or not to continue the disastrous effort. There was a peace party, and it was growing, but it had no rallying point. The action now urged would give them a pivot on which to form, not, indeed, the action of England alone, which was to be deprecated altogether, but that to be taken conjointly by several leading Powers. With such assistance the peace party would rapidly gather strength and numbers, and thus we might reach the issue all desired. And there was a contingency that could not be overlooked with safety. Whether right or wrong, there did exist in the South a feeling of exasperation on the subject of the policy adopted in this country, and if it should happen that terms of peace should be offered and accepted by the South while under this feeling, it might readily be imagined that such terms might be directly aimed, not only at our interests, but our peace and safety. After alluding to the nature of the struggle and the heroic defence of their soil by the people of the South, Mr. Spence said that the deputation felt it a Christian duty to urge that some effort should be made, whatever might be its form, to influence the termination of this deplorable strife.

Mr. Marsh, M.P., wished to call his Lordship's attention to the fact that the opinion that an attempt at mediation would be attended with good results was not confined to England, but was shared by the whole of the South, the peace party of the North, and by the nations of the European Continent.

Mr. Danby Seymour, M.P., said he joined the deputation entirely on principles of humanity, and without the slightest bias towards either of the belligerents; he was unwilling to see slavery flourish, but he was equally unwilling to see a nation forced to submit to a government which they detested.

The Rev. W. W. Malet said that his experience, gained from a visit both to the Federal and Confederate States during the war, and from intercourse with all classes of persons both in the North and the South, was that there was a general weariness of the war and a desire for peace.

Lord Palmerston, in reply, said that two facts were abundantly clear—viz., that the war was cruelly destructive to the Americans themselves, and the inconvenience caused by it to other nations was excessive. The question remained, whether the Government had any rational ground for supposing that the Federal Government would listen to any proposals of mediation at the present moment. There was an old couplet—

> They who in quarrels interpose
> Will often wipe a bloody nose.

He was not afraid of a bloody nose, but he feared that premature efforts would only have the effect of exasperating the North, and making it more difficult, when the passions were a little calmed, to effect the object all must have in view. The Government was led to think, from all accounts that reached them, that this was not the moment at which any mediatory proposals could be usefully made. Each party was equally confident of ultimate success, and the North especially jealous of interference. If, however, at any future time, reasonable ground could be shown for supposing that friendly suggestions would be listened to, Her Majesty's Government would be happy to use their efforts to arrive at such a desirable result as that of terminating this unhappy war.

Admiral Anson, the chairman of the society, having thanked his Lordship for his courtesy, the deputation withdrew.

The Echo of Poland, a journal which represents at New York the interests of that nationality, publishes the following document:—'An Address to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives in Congress assembled: We, the undersigned citizens or inhabitants of the United States, think it our duty to bring the following facts under your notice. You cannot but know that for more than a year past the kingdom of Poland has been making war upon Russia for the purpose of regaining its independence. Before the explosion of this war, a large number of Poles had been compelled by violence to submit to the Russian recruiting laws and to serve as soldiers or sailors. Many of these Poles were serving on board the Russian ships which came into the ports of the United States during the last and the present year; they immediately left a service which was odious to them, and enlisted in the Federal army. They fought under the flag of the Union and shed their blood for America, as their countrymen, Kosciuszko and Pulawski, had done in times gone by. We now learn from an authentic source that many of these Poles were claimed by Russian agents as subjects of the Czar and deserters, and have been handed over by the officers under whom they served, taken across the territories of the Union, and put on board Russian vessels. If this proceeding were only a strict execution of an American law or of an international treaty, or even if it were in conformity with the general laws and usages of international right, we could only bow, and lament the lot of our unfortunate countrymen. But we are assured, and we firmly believe, that this conduct is not only not in conformity with any American law, but, further, that it is a violation both of the statutes of the country and of every international law and custom. For this reason we address ourselves to you. What is done cannot be undone. Milawski and other Poles who trusted in the protection of the American flag, and who have fought under the shadow of it, have been delivered, as we have already stated, and have already suffered the penalties of desertion. But there are other Poles in the service of the United States who have as yet escaped the eyes of the Russian agents. It is on their behalf that we now appeal to your sense of honour and justice.' The signatures of a large body of natives and foreigners are attached.

GENERAL LEE'S DESPATCHES.—The following official despatches have been published:- 'Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia, June 25, 1864.—Honourable Secretary of War.—Sir: General W. H. F. Lee pursued the enemy's cavalry which advanced along the Southside Railroad. He had a skirmish on the 22nd, near Dinwiddie Court House, and the next day struck their column in flank, near Black's and White's, cutting it in two, and getting possession of the road by which they were moving towards Nottoway Court House. The road was held after an engagement which continued from 12 M. until dark, the enemy making repeated attempts to break through and rejoin his advance. He withdrew from General Lee's front at daylight on the 24th, leaving his dead and wounded on the field, taking the road to Hungarytown and Keysville. General Lee is still following them.—Very respectfully, R. E. LEE, General.'——'Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia, June 25, 9.30 P.M.—General Hampton reports that the enemy's cavalry advanced yesterday to Nance's Shop, and entrenched themselves there. He attacked them and drove them from their works, pursuing them until 9 P.M. to within two miles of Charles City Court House. They left their dead and wounded on the field and along the route. Great credit is due to General Hampton and his command for their handsome success.—Very respectfully, R. E. LEE, General.'

Colonel Archer Ewing died in Atlanta on the 16th June.

THE FEDERAL DISASTER BEFORE PETERSBURG: A NORTHERN ACCOUNT.

(From the Philadelphia Age.)

WE are able to give our readers a correct history of the Federal disaster in front of Petersburg on Wednesday last. On Tuesday (June 21) Grant's line extended around Petersburg from the north-east to the south-east. Brooks' corps was on the northern flank, and with Smith's corps held the Federal line north of the Appomattox. Wright was on the south bank of the Appomattox. Hancock was south of Wright, Burnside south-east of Hancock, and Warren on the southern flank. Warren's line extended a short distance across the Petersburg and Norfolk railroad, south-east of the town. On Tuesday Grant began a complicated movement. Just above the neck on which Bermuda Hundred stands there is a second neck formed by the winding course of the James River. On the north side of the river, opposite the end of the neck, a small stream, called Four Mile Creek, empties. It is about three miles above Bermuda Hundred and Malvern Hill. On Monday night a pontoon bridge had been laid across the James to the mouth of the creek, and the ironclads were brought up above the bridge. The various movements then began. One division of Brooks' corps was detached, under command of General Foster. Foster marched from the works in front of Bermuda Hundred to the bridge, crossed it, and, accompanied by the ironclads, went about two miles up the north bank of the James. No enemy was seen, and he halted at the Kingsland road, a road which runs from the James above Four Mile Creek to the village of New Market, near Malvern Hill. The ironclads anchored in the river near him, and he began the construction of an earthwork. This work is on the north bank of the river, opposite the end of Butler's line of forts on the south bank. A fleet of sunken stone vessels connects the two. The work is twelve miles from Richmond, and was made necessary by the fear of the Confederates planting batteries on that side which could throw shells across the stream into Butler's camp. Foster was not molested whilst digging, though various reconnoitring parties of the enemy made their appearance. Whilst Foster was crossing the James, General Smith with his entire corps marched to the Appomattox and crossed to the south side, from which he had come only a day or two before. This left but two divisions at Bermuda Hundred, under Brooks, to defend Butler's long line. It was late on Tuesday afternoon when Smith reached Wright's and Hancock's camps, on the south side of the Appomattox. Wright and Hancock drew their troops out of the works, and Smith marched in. Wright and Hancock went to the rear, and early on Wednesday morning started westward towards the Weldon Railroad, running south from Petersburg, and the Danville Railroad, running south-west from Richmond. Warren marched after them. Burnside and Smith were left in front of Petersburg. Wright and Hancock were thus in a very dangerous position. They were stretched out in long columns, crossing the various roads running from Petersburg at right angles, with the flank exposed to Confederate attacks. General Lee at once took advantage of it. He sent a column down the Weldon Railroad, and another down the Jerusalem road, which is east of the railroad. The Confederates on the Weldon Railroad entrenched themselves in front of Wright, so that he could not reach the road. The Federal cavalry, however, by making a détour of about ten miles south of Wright, reached the railroad and tore up the track. Wright, finding the enemy in his front, halted the troops. At once, the other Confederate column crossing down the Jerusalem road, attacked Hancock's flank. Hancock's troops were surprised. They broke and in confusion retired southwards. The enemy penetrated between the divisions and even the brigades. Warren came up as hastily as possible, but found the enemy entrenched on ground taken from Hancock. In less than an hour 1,000 Federal prisoners and 4 guns were captured, and 1,500 were killed and wounded. Far in the rear General Birney, who had command of Hancock's troops, rallied them. Night came on and prevented any pursuit by the Confederates. Whilst Hancock was attacked, Wright, who was confronted by the enemy on the railroad, was also assaulted. He could not go to Hancock's assistance, for the enemy, in large numbers, came down upon his advance from the railroad embankment. The skirmishers retreated upon the main body. The enemy passed on, got into Wright's rear, and captured the greater part of two regiments. Wright at once ordered a retreat. Attacking the enemy with part of his force to cover the movement, his corps retired to the position taken by Hancock. Here both corps dug rifle-pits to protect themselves. The darkness, however, prevented any Confederate attacks. These disasters compelled the abandonment of the expedition.

We know not whether it was in pure fun, or with an arrière-pensée of malice, that Punch, in his number for this week, has published the following poetical comments on a reform lately made in the Navy List. If they were written in the latter spirit, we may say they are not less cutting than deserved. Our readers who are unacquainted with the technicalities of our Admiralty language, should know that the English navy was, up to a few weeks past, divided into the Red, White, and Blue Squadrons, which ranked in the order in which they are mentioned, red having the priority as the national and most noble colour. In the new arrangement, however, the order is almost inverted: our war navy is to show the white flag, while our merchants are to display the red banner of England, as the fittest representatives of the nation. Truly we are a nation of shopkeepers!—

THE NEW COLOURS.
A Nursery Sea-Song.

So we've done with the Red, White, and Blue,
And we've done with the Red, White, and Blue,
For we hear from Lord Clarence,
The nautical Barons
Have made an arrangement that 's new.

Her Majesty's ensign is White,
Yes, Her Majesty's ensign is White,
And ships of all nations,
Must make salutations,
Whenever that flag comes in sight.

But what have you done with the Blue?
And what have you done with the Blue?
That colour is handed
To vessels commanded
And manned by Reserve-Men so true.

Then who shall display the bold Red?
And who shall display the bold Red?
Bold Merchants, whose story
Is England's true glory,
Shall hoist the proud flag. Go to bed.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

The Foreign Office has officially notified Captain Halsted, R.N., Secretary, Lloyd's, that the blockade of the German ports is raised to the 31st inst.

SHIPS ARRIVED.

AT LIVERPOOL.—July 14: The Helen Sophia, from Demerara. The Halswell, The British Queen (steamer), from Havre. The Gezina, from Rio Grande. The Braganza (steamer), from Oporto. July 15: The Excelsior, from Havre. The Lady Douglas, from Pernambuco. July 16: The Kepler (steamer), from River Plate.—July 17: The Relampago, from Pernambuco. The Frankfort (steamer), from Lisbon. July 18: The Elizabeth Ray, from Rio Janeiro.—July 19: The Burdeos y Habana, from Manilla. The Ouda, from Buenos Ayres. The Amy, from Nassau. July 20: The Pink, from Nassau.—The steamer Tasmanian, from St. Thomas, brings intelligence of the loss of a well-known Liverpool trader, the ship Ann Best. She was reported by last mail as loading at Demerara for this port. By this arrival we learn that on beating out of the river Essequibo, on her homeward passage, she struck on a rock, and became so leaky that she immediately sank. No attempts had, up to the latest news, been made to lift her, and she lay in eighteen feet of water. She is a colonial-built vessel, having been constructed expressly for the West India trade, at Quebec, in 1841, and is the property of Mr. T. Carr, of this port.

AT GRAVESEND.—July 14: The Treasure, for Oporto. The Cadiz (steamer), from Cadiz. The Azorian, from Teneriffe. The Neptune (steamer), from Havre.—July 15: The Indefatigable, from Havana. The Gibraltar (steamer), from Cadiz. The Alphid, from Havana.—July 16: The Columbine, from Nassau. The Agatha, from Havre.—July 17: The Amazon (steamer), The Rover (steamer), from Lisbon. The Moskwa, from Havana.—July 18: The Volunteer (steamer), from Cadiz. The City of Hamburgh (steamer), from Havre.—July 19: The Sidney Hall (steamer), from Lisbon. The Torbay Lass, from Nassau. The Samson (steamer), from Oporto. The Peninsula (steamer), from Cadiz. The Turku, from Havana.

AT FALMOUTH.—July 15: The Aurora, from Porto Rico. The Santiago, from Mauritius, for Havre.—July 17: The Hebe, from Bahia.—July 18: The Clio, from Demerara. The Florence Nightingale, from Havana. The Crown, from Matanzas.—July 19: The Johann Gottfried, from Bahia. The Spitfire, from Trinidad. The Runner, from Havana. The Hetty Ellen, from Matanzas. The Astrea, from Bahia. The Iris, The Henry Woolley, from Havana. The Astrid, from Bahia. The Sea-Bird, The Catherine, from Rio Grande. The Asuncion, from Cuba. The Hesse Darmstadt, from Havana.—July 20: The Arab, from Cuba. The Due Sorelle, from Montevideo. The True Blue, from Porto Cabello.

AT KINGROAD.—July 14: The Julia, from Havana.—July 15: The Northern Light, from Havana.

AT PLYMOUTH.—July 19: The Esmeralda, from Bahamas.

AT BRISTOL.—July 14: The Isabella Ridley, from Trinidad. The Pioneer (steamer), from Cadiz.—July 18: The Elizabeth Yeo, from Quebec. The schooner Sally and Ann, arrived at this port, saw the masts of a sunken vessel apparently six or eight feet above the water, July 6, in the Bristol Channel (at low water), bearing from Hedwicks Light-vessel S.E. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. about one mile, and in the track of vessels bound either up or down.

AT QUEENSTOWN.—July 14: The Mary for Montevideo (leaky). July 17: The Whydah from Rio Grande. The Hope (steamer) for Nassau. July 18: The Southern Eagle, The Australia from Callao. July 19: The Gertrude from River Plate. The Giuseppe from Montevideo. The Hippolyte from Matanzas. The Mary Anne and Jane, The Jacoba from Demerara. The Ella (steamer) for Bermuda. July 20: The Marcello from Porto Rico. The Gertruida Jacoba from Parana.

AT BERWICK.—July 14: The San Jose from Bilboa.

AT TORBAY.—July 19: The Symmetry, The Star of Peace from Pomeroon.

AT SUNDERLAND.—July 14: The Surprise from Havre, July 15: The Jeune Adele, The Jane from Havre. July 16: The Eclipse from Havre.

AT BRIDLINGTON BAY.—July 14: The Deborah, from Havre.

AT NEWPORT.—July 14: The Mayfield, for Santos. The Chilian Packet, for Buenos Ayres. The James Holmes, for St. Thomas.—July 16: The Nathalie, for St. Thomas. The Lampeyrouse, for Buenos Ayres. The Storfurst, for Havana. July 18: The Etienne Marie, for Bilboa. The St. François, for St. Thomas.

AT CLYDE.—July 14.—The Mentor, from Havana. The Othello, from Pernambuco.—July 15: The Rokeby (steamer), from Oporto.—July 16: The Fanny, from Havana.—July 18: The Avalon, from Trinidad. The Dante, from Pernambuco.—July 19: The Harbinger, from Matanzas. The Blanch (steamer), from Havre.

AT SHIELDS.—July 14: The Hortense Sidonie, from Pomeroon.—July 15: The Effort, from Havre.

AT STOCKTON.—July 15: The Queen, from Quebec.

AT SALCOMBE.—July 16.—The Warbler, from Porto Rico.—July 19: The Queen of the West, from Pomeroon.

OFF SCILLY.—July 14: The Havre, from Trinidad. The Henry Woolley, from Havana (damaged). The Dundrennan, from Porto Rico. The Fortunato, The Coniston, from Oporto.

OFF SOUTH FORELAND.—July 15: The Prinses Amelie, for Montevideo.

OFF THE START.—July 15: The Hermann Izaak, for Curacao. The Antelope, for Matamoras. The Levant, for Pernambuco.

CHANNEL.—July 14: The Delta, The Lisette, from Buenos Ayres.

AT SWANSEA.—July 17: The Belle, from Teneriffe. The Lily, from Bilboa.

AT CARDIFF.—July 18: The Royal Tar, The Egeria, from Bilboa.

AT DUBLIN.—July 17: The W. Connal (steamer), from Havre.

AT WHITEHAVEN.—July 18: The Zante Packet, from Jamaica.

AT STRANGFORD.—July 16: The Alma, from Miramichi.

AT DUNDEE.—July 18: The Fairy from Havre.

AT HULL.—July 18: The Hawk (steamer) from Havre.

SHIPS SAILED.

GRAVESEND.—July 14: The Oporto for Lisbon. The Cadiz (steamer) for Cadiz.—July 15: The Tartar (steamer) for Lisbon.—July 16: The Anna for Buenos Ayres. The Bilboa (steamer) for Bilbao.—July 18: The Amelia for Berbice. The Memphis, The Sunbeam for Quebec. July 20, The Ruckers for Demerara. The Star of the East, for Nassau.

LIVERPOOL.—July 14: The Hope (steamer) for Nassau. The Allan, The Bona Ventura, The T. & J. Rees, The Belgian (steamer), The Great Britain for Quebec. The Athete for Valparaiso. A new ironclad ram, in course of construction at Bordeaux, is just now exciting considerable attention. This vessel, named the Sphinx, is of the following dimensions:—Length, 52 metres; breadth, 10 metres; depth of hold, 5 metres 20 centimetres; height of batteries, 2 metres 30 centimetres; and draft of water 4 metres 40 centimetres. She is armour-plated from the deck to 1 metre 80 centimetres below the water-line, with iron plates 10, 11, and 12 centimetres thick, according to their position. Her prow is furnished with a formidable steel beak, placed several metres below the water-line. Her deck is coated with thin iron plating between the beams and planking, and is surmounted by two ironclad towers of great resisting power. The forward tower mounts a pivot gun of enormous calibre, capable of discharging a shot of 800 pounds weight, and the other two 70-pounder pivot guns of long range. She will be propelled by twin screws, worked by engines of 300-horse power.

'EXCEEDINGLY SATISFACTORY.'—Reporting on General Wilson's expedition, Mr. Stanton wrote:—'Wilson's loss of property is a small wagon train used to carry ammunition, his ambulance train, and twelve cannon.' Commenting on Mr. Stanton's report, the New York Herald says: 'The latest news from Wilson's cavalry expedition is exceedingly satisfactory.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The money market during the past week has become firmer. The demand for accommodation at the Bank, as well as amongst the brokers, has been rather more urgent, but without anything like severe pressure. Out of doors the terms have advanced to 5⅞ and 6 per cent., the latter being still the Bank minimum. These high rates, with the continued withdrawal of gold for transmission abroad, and the absence of [illegible] which is now regarded with some [illegible] with respect to the issue of the approaching harvest, [illegible] will compel the Bank directors at no distant period to advance their terms for discount. [illegible] has been some little anxiety felt by the announcement of the stoppage of the Eastern Bank of England, whose chief office is at Norwich; but the affair is not likely to cause much injury, an arrangement having been announced only a few days ago for its amalgamation with one of the Joint-stock Banks. There is a good supply of money in all quarters, and the Joint-stock Banks are [illegible] with their resources at 5¼ and 5½ per cent. In the early part of the week money was very easy on the Stock Exchange, but to-day there has been more demand, and the rates are up to 5 and 5½ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The transactions in bullion and specie continue to be of an advanced character, and there appears some probability that it may continue so for some little time. There has not been any gold sent into the Bank this week, whilst the withdrawals have amounted to not less than 405,000*l.*, the greater portion of which has been taken for Spain. The arrivals of specie this week have been very trifling, and it is anticipated that what may reach this country will for a time be purchased for transhipment. The Ceylon steamer takes out 92,873*l.* for the East, of which 2,000*l.* in gold and 15,000*l.* in silver are for Madras, the remainder being chiefly in silver for China and the Straits. The demand for bar silver is not very active, and the price remains nominally at 61$\frac{1}{2}$d. per oz., the price obtained for the supplies by the Tasmanian. Mexican dollars are very scarce; the small quantity brought by the last mail have been sold at 64*d.* per oz., being at the same rate as those disposed of by the previous packet.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has not exhibited any great degree of activity during the week; nevertheless, the transactions have been rather more numerous, but very little alteration has taken place in prices, but the tendency has been towards increased firmness. Business is still to a great extent limited by the unsettled state of affairs on the Continent, and will, in all probability, remain so till something definite is settled with regard to the Danish question. Consols closed this evening at 90$\frac{1}{2}$ to 90$\frac{5}{8}$ ex. div. for money, and 90$\frac{3}{4}$ to 90$\frac{7}{8}$ ex. div. for the account, which, as contrasted with last week, is an improvement of about $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Exchequer bills continue unchanged, the March issue at 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis., and those of June at 5*s.* dis. to par. The foreign stock market is fairly supported both as regards dealings and prices; the tendency generally is good, but the advance is only fractional, except in Turkish, which show an improvement of $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 per cent. The market, however, closed rather flat this evening. Greek being at 24$\frac{3}{8}$ to 24$\frac{5}{8}$; Mexican, 29$\frac{1}{4}$ to 29$\frac{1}{2}$; Spanish passives, 28$\frac{3}{8}$ to 28$\frac{7}{8}$; ditto certificates, 10 to 10$\frac{1}{4}$; Turkish Six per cents. of 1854, 91 to 92; and those of 1862, at 69$\frac{1}{2}$ to 70$\frac{1}{4}$ ex. div.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been very firm this week, and a large business doing; the price at one moment touched 80; since there has been a slight reaction caused by realisations of profits after the late rapid advance. The closing quotation is 76 to 78.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Business in American Government and Railway securities continues to be on a very restricted scale, the only exception being in Illinois Central $100 shares, which have been rather pressed upon the market, and which have found purchasers only at constantly receding rates. With this exception, scarcely half-a-dozen transactions have been recorded during the week. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section first mortgage have changed hands at 74; ditto, ditto, second mortgage, 70. Erie $100 shares, all paid, 50$\frac{1}{4}$ and 45. Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 40$\frac{1}{4}$, 40$\frac{1}{4}$, 38$\frac{3}{4}$, 42, 42$\frac{1}{4}$, 44, 45, 44$\frac{1}{4}$, and 44$\frac{1}{2}$ dis.; ditto, ditto, all paid, 54, 55, and 54.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta 17,10,000 rupees, to Bombay 12,00,000 rupees, and to Madras 90,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before 1*s.* 11$\frac{1}{2}$d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* 11$\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 180 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* 11$\frac{3}{4}$d. will receive about 16 per cent., on Bombay at 2*s.*, about 65 per cent. and all above those prices in full.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There has on the whole been a good business transacted in British Railway shares, and, with but very few exceptions, arising from special circumstances, prices show a considerable improvement. To-day the market has not been quite so brisk, and quotations are hardly so buoyant as they were. As compared with last week there has been a rise of 6 per cent. in Glasgow and South Western; of 4 per cent. in Chatham and Dover and North Staffordshire; of 2$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Caledonian; of 2 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, London and Blackwall, North-Eastern (Leeds), Scottish North-Eastern, and Shropshire Union; of 1$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in North-Eastern (Berwick), of 1 per cent. in North-Eastern (York), and North London; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in Great-Western, and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in London and Brighton, London and North-Western, London and South-Western, Sheffield, Metropolitan, Midland and North British. On the other hand there has been a decline of 2$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great-Eastern, and of 1 per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and West Cornwall. In Foreign shares a moderate business has been transacted, at slightly improved quotations, and in those of the British possessions rather more has been doing, and Canadian and Indian descriptions show more firmness.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, ETC.

At the half-yearly meeting of the City Bank, the report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the liabilities and assets, and the profit and loss account for the six months ending June 30, show a net profit of 57,960*l.*, and which enables the directors to declare the usual dividend of 6 per cent. per annum upon the paid-up capital, and a bonus of 3*l.* 10*s.*

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: July 13, 1864.

THE CONFEDERATES IN MARYLAND—INDISPOSITION OF THE MILITIA TO OBEY MR. LINCOLN'S CALL—THE 'ALABAMA'—MR. WELLES'S LETTER—THE DOME OF ST. PAUL'S THREATENED—THE DEMAND FOR THE SURRENDER OF CAPTAIN SEMMES—THE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES—KENTUCKY—THE RECONSTRUCTION ACT—MR. LINCOLN IGNORES THE ACTION OF CONGRESS—CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

THERE is a marvellous change in the face of the war. Grant's campaign for the possession of Richmond has come to a dead stop; after losing the best part of his army, he is sitting, or supposed to be sitting, in trenches before Petersburg, while Lee is frightening the North with the approaches of a Confederate army upon Washington and Baltimore. You may learn from the papers as much as is really known here of the strength and the objects of this invasion, which is very little: neither the press nor the Government appears to have any accurate knowledge of what is going on, nor plans for defence. What is certain is that the Confederates, satisfied of the security of Richmond, have sent a considerable force across the Potomac at several points—rumour says at least forty thousand men, and more coming—and that they are doing very much as they please in Maryland. They have occupied Harper's Ferry, and Frederick, and Hagerstown, and Westminster, and Newmarket, and other small towns, without serious obstruction. One of their columns encountered a force of ten thousand Federal troops under General Wallace, at the Monocacy, and drove them back, capturing the Federal General Tyler. By yesterday parties of them had reached to within seven miles of Washington City and six miles of Baltimore, cutting the telegraph wires and destroying the railroads, so as to interrupt all communication between the North and the cities of Baltimore and Washington. On Monday they captured two passenger-trains between Baltimore and Philadelphia, and got among the prisoners Major-General Franklin. Having command, by gunboats, of the crossings of the Susquehannah River, communications are to be opened by water. This morning we do not know what is going on in Maryland; we only know that a great panic seems to prevail, and that if there be really a great force of veteran Confederates in Maryland, they will find few disciplined troops to resist them until a part of Grant's army is recalled for the defence of the capital. It has been surmised that it is part of the plan of General Lee to complete the defeat of General Grant by compelling the Government to withdraw his army back on the Potomac again.

The militia have been called out to repel this invasion; but they come so scantily in numbers, and with such reluctance, that it is perfectly evident that the people are thoroughly sick of the war. They will not come out, even in their own defence, at the imploring call of the authorities, and they can hardly be persuaded or forced to go to the defence of their neighbours. Governor Bradford, of Maryland, has issued a complaining address, in which he reproaches the people of Maryland for not responding freely to the call to arms, and with wasting time 'disgracefully' in trying to find 'an excuse for skulking.' Hard words these from the governor of an invaded State, invoking the inhabitants to take up arms in their own defence! Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, has issued proclamation after proclamation to hurry up the militia, which will not come as they are called, and a third time reliance is placed on New York—and mostly on the city of New York and the vicinity—to send its organised and volunteer militia to the defence of Pennsylvania and Maryland, Baltimore and Washington. This time the demand is met with murmurs and resistance. New York City considers herself grievously oppressed by these repeated demands for extraordinary service at distant places from which the interior counties are exempted. The soldiers have no taste for going to the wars at all for anybody, and they have a particular distaste to going to Pennsylvania, where they were so ungratefully treated on their last expedition to defend Harrisburg against Lee's former advance. Governor Seymour, of this State, has been very active in endeavouring to furnish the troops the general Government wants, and the regiments required to go have been designated. The instinct of discipline impels many of the officers to consent to go, although some of them demand conditions and explanations, and dispute the right of any authority, State or Federal, to compel the State militia to go beyond the bounds of the State. The repugnance of the men to go is openly declared, and no regiment can rely upon half its proper numbers to enable it to march. Volunteers must be got up; and, if this process is too slow, drafting is threatened in order to fill up the ranks. It is a significant indication of the under-current of popular feeling in regard to the war, that several of the officers, in presenting to the soldiers inducements to consent to go out on this call, took great pains to assure them that they are not wanted to make an attack on the Confederates, but to defend their own capital.

Mayor Gunther has interposed another powerful plea against the removal of the volunteer militia from the city of New York at this time. He advises Major-General Sanford (of the State troops) that it would be extremely unsafe, in the present condition of affairs, to leave New York without an ample domestic force to suppress riots. He distinctly avers that the effect of the measures of the general Government, and the consequences of war, have so inflamed the minds of the poorer classes, that riots may at any time be apprehended, and that in the absence of the military he cannot answer for the preservation of peace or the protection of property. Very little help, therefore, is Mr. Lincoln, or Governor Curtin, or Governor Bradford, likely to get from New York this time. If the Confederates be as strong in Maryland as the excitement in the public mind leads one to think not improbable, the safety of Washington and Baltimore can only be secured by the speedy return of Grant and his army.

The conduct of the Confederates in the captured places this time is variously represented. The press correspondents in general, of course, say that they are robbing and carrying off plunder indiscriminately; others speak of their general forbearance to touch private property, and abstinence from the destruction of towns or houses. There have been some exceptions to this, but the exception proves the rule. The house of Governor Bradford, of Maryland, about four miles from Baltimore, was destroyed by direct authority of the Confederate General (Bradley Johnson), as a specific retaliation for the burning of the house of Governor Letcher, of Virginia, by General Hunter, a short time ago. At Hagerstown, a contribution was levied on the town, as a ransom from fire; the Confederate General, McCausland, in making this exaction stated as its justification that General Hunter in his late raid into South-western Virginia had burned every house in his track for three hundred miles. A detachment was sent to destroy the house of General Cadwallader as a set-off, perhaps, for the wanton burning by Kilpatrick's orders, in his recent raid in Virginia, of the country house of Mr. Seddon, the Confederate Secretary of War. These are supposed to be exceptional acts, done under official direction, for a specific purpose, and with direct responsibility to the Government. They are no part of that system of universal and indiscriminate devastation and pillage which has marked the track of the invading armies of the North all over the South; and if men shrink from them as opposed to the more humane practices of modern warfare, they cannot fail to admire the forbearance which limits retaliation, by the way of warning, to the punishing of notable personages for notable acts of vandalism.

All Yankeedom has been in ecstasies of joy over the destruction of the Alabama by the Kearsage. It is a naval victory; they were badly in want of one, and they make the most of it. The Secretary of the Navy has publicly thanked Captain Winslow, and, with the Yankee habit of official boasting, exaggerates the force and misstates the condition of the Alabama. He tells that officer of the satisfaction of the Government at the victory 'over a vessel superior in tonnage, superior in number of guns, and superior in the number of her crew'—averments which might have been expected and left to be forgotten in some journal pandering to the greedy vanity of the populace; but in a written communication which is the act of a Government, they are shameful. Everybody in England and France knows that in armour and armament, condition, number of men, and weight of metal, the Alabama was overmatched. Captain Winslow is to be made Commodore—perhaps Admiral—for the feat, and Mr. Gideon Welles, the Naval Secretary, is so happy over it, that he holds it up to public admiration as his own vindication from all the charges made against the inefficiencies and mismanagements of his department. He claims, in his complimentary letter to Captain Winslow, that the Americans ought now to be satisfied that, 'in this, as in every naval action of this unhappy war, neither the ships, the guns, nor the crews have deteriorated, but that they maintain the ability and continue the renown which have ever adorned our naval annals.' This is assuredly making the most, for national glorification and the profit of an unpopular department, of a single naval success, wherein there was so little to boast of in superior skill or bravery. You will notice the small spite of the Secretary in writing to Captain Winslow of the Alabama as 'a piratical craft,' after the Captain had made a report to him of having paroled the crew as 'prisoners of war.' The occasion has given vent to the popular wrath against England. The presence of the English yacht, and her taking in Captain Semmes and other survivors of the sunken vessel and carrying them as guests into Southampton, is another English offence; and vociferous calls are made upon the Government to demand the delivering up of these men as prisoners of war unlawfully taken from the possession of the Kearsage. One enthusiastic journal requires the Government, if this demand should be refused, to send a fleet up the Thames, and 'shake the dome of St. Paul's with the thunder of American cannon.'

Without discussing the question of international law on this subject, which is too clear for question, the British Government may reasonably ask to start fair with the Government of the United States before entertaining this demand. There are a good many British subjects in the United States upon whom the British Government has a much better claim than the United States can have upon Captain Semmes, who was only prisoner constructively, and was never in the possession of the Kearsage, and, if left to her care, would probably have been drowned. There is one example, somewhat conspicuous in this city, in Thomas Francis Meagher, who was a prisoner of war—or, more literally, a captured rebel who broke his parole in Australia, and ran away to this country, where he has been made a brigadier-general in the army of the United States, and now supports this war an Irish training for the invasion of England. When the Government of the United States shows itself in earnest in its pretensions, and entitles itself to ask Great Britain to give up Confederates who are there in asylum—were never prisoners, in fact—by tendering to her the person of Brigadier-General Meagher, England may still defer an answer until satisfied on another question or two. For instance, two years ago the Federal blockading fleet before Charleston was attacked by Confederate rams. The United States steamer Mercedita, being attacked and beaten, professed to be in a sinking state, and surrendered. The Confederates thereupon paroled the officers. These made off with the vessel they had saved by pretending to be sinking, and when they were demanded by the Confederates to be delivered up as prisoners of war, the Government refused. There are a good many like cases of faithlessness on the part of the Government of the United States, which Great Britain would naturally require to be so explained that reliance may be placed on its future observance of its own rules, even should she consent to debate the point whether she would surrender these men under any circumstances. It is not likely, however, that this Government will listen to popular clamour so far as to make the demand. The Times of this city, which is the peculiar representative in the press of the Secretary of State, is almost alone among the New York journals in questioning the right to reclaim these men as prisoners. This may be taken as good indication that the Government does not mean to meddle with the matter in that way. It seems that Captain Winslow has been so indiscreet and so brutal as to require, with threats, the Confederate agent for the Alabama at Cherbourg to find out and return to him as prisoners the seamen from the Alabama who were saved from drowning, and carried ashore in France by the French pilot-boats. It was a piece of presumption for him to expect that neutral vessels of all nations should act as tenders under his authority, and might not pick up men swimming for their lives without accounting for them to their enemies, who wanted either the power or the inclination to save them. Mr. Dayton will probably think twice before he presents such a demand to the French Government. It is safe to bully a Confederate agent abroad from the deck of a man-of-war, and popular here to abuse the English; but these blustering gentry will let the French Emperor alone.

The retirement of Mr. Chase and the repeal of the Gold Bill were hailed as promising indications of improvement in the financial condition of the Government; but they have not yet given the Treasury any help. There was a vague hope of relief in some way by a change of secretaries and a change of policy, although nobody is able to speak with any degree of confidence of the manner in which the new man will be able to extract order out of the chaos which his predecessor left him. He begins with a title to public confidence in the disinterestedness of his public character, as a man without political aspirations, and entirely disconnected from the corrupt cliques which surrounded Mr. Chase. Mr. Fessenden is a capable and honest man, but what can Mr. Fessenden do? He finds an empty treasury and demands for hundreds of millions of dollars to meet pressing obligations, a current expenditure of not less than a thousand millions of dollars a year to provide for, and prospective revenues of not over three hundred millions; and he has no means for meeting the deficit but by adding new issues of Government paper to a mass already so redundant that it has fallen in value till it is worth less than forty cents in the dollar, gold ranging from 250 to 285; or by borrowing at frightful rates, if he can, under laws which his predecessor pronounced to be insufficient. What can Mr. Fessenden do?

Since Congress adjourned, the President has issued a proclamation putting the whole State of Kentucky under martial law. The grounds for this act of extreme military rigour towards that 'loyal' border State, are, that 'combinations have been formed in the said State of Kentucky for the purpose of inciting the rebel forces to renew the operations of civil war within the said State.' There is no more reason for this charge now than there has been for a long time, in which the State authorities, in concert with the Federal authorities, have been able to maintain government; nor is there any extraordinary condition of affairs there, except, as Mr. Lincoln's adversaries allege, in its political attitude towards his reelection. The opposition to Mr. Lincoln is very strong among the people of Kentucky, and the proclamation of martial law is said to be the strategy of the candidate, in order to put the elections there under the control of his military dependants. It would have been, three years ago, impossible to credit such a charge against a chief magistrate in this Republic; but Mr. Lincoln has done so much to show that he manages this war, plans campaigns, directs the marching of armies, and orders battles in the interests of party, and for his own aggrandisement as the head of the party, that this subversion by the stroke of a pen of the sovereignty of the State of Kentucky is charged and credited as an electioneering device to enable him to seize the vote of Kentucky.

He has, since that, issued still another proclamation, which assumes to make law and dispense with law at his own discretion, and not to be afraid to proclaim it. Congress, at the recent session, passed an Act, and sent it to the President for his approval, regulating the form of proceeding in the reconstruction of government in rebel States which are subjugated or otherwise reclaimed. The Act contained a pointed and peremptory reversal of the proceedings of the President in Arkansas and Louisiana; and, if he had signed it, would have annulled the 'loyal' Governments he caused to be constructed under the direction of the generals he sent out there at the head of armies of occupation. The President did not sign the Bill, and instead of waiting to give his reasons in the usual form, declares them by proclamation. He therein gives notice that he is unwilling to consent to anything which Congress may do to annul what he has been doing in Louisiana and Arkansas, where he has instituted government on the presumed consent of one-tenth of the loyal inhabitants. These must stand, but as to other States, the Bill from Congress makes another system, which he is disposed to think well of in the main as 'a very proper plan,' although he is 'unprepared' to agree to some parts of it. Therefore he will not make it law by signing the Bill, for those parts revoking his acts would be in force, but selects such parts as do not contravene his own position, and tells the country he will put them in force by that executive power which Congress especially designed to shut out from control over the subject. More positive proclamation of executive-made law, or more thorough contempt of constitutional and legislative restrictions, could not be well imagined; yet it scarcely excites comment among the numerous acts of lawlessness with which the history of his administration abounds.

The Canadians have had a centralised government, with a single legislature, exercising authority over an immense territory, and people of various races and interests. The consequences have been sectional parties and bitter contentions and jealousies, which have at last brought government to a deadlock. Ministry after ministry is changed, and the feuds remain unappeased, because no general legislature could possibly satisfy, or do justice to, all the local interests which fall under the sway of that sort of government. The Canadians, therefore, have agreed upon a plan of de-centralisation, to divide Canada in several provinces, to each of which shall be referred all the functions of local self-government, while there is to be a parliament for the purposes of a general government in matters concerning them all. The precisely opposite course is going on in the United States. Here there were States possessed originally of separate powers of self-government over different forms of civilisation and various interests in a vast extent of territory, but committing their common relations among one another and towards foreigners to a general legislature, with few powers strictly defined. The general authority thus created is now engaged in a bloody and devastating war, for the purpose of extinguishing the liberty of self-government in thirteen of the States. To carry out that plan they are constrained to suppress the independent character of the States, and accumulate new and despotic powers for the central head. They are labouring to build up by the military power just that sort of centralisation which the Canadians have tried and are now endeavouring to escape from. The movement in Canada is exactly the reverse of what is going on in the United States, and is an emphatic remonstrance against all projects of annexation to the United States. It aims at division and distribution of power for the preservation of the rights of minorities, in order that diversities may be protected against each other, and brought to work harmoniously together for just government. Here a domineering majority is attempting to crush into impossible uniformity multitudinous interests, and various institutions, and differing forms of labour and types of civilisation extending over a country vastly greater and more populous than Canada.

9 A.M.

The city is full of incredible rumours. One side says Grant has taken Petersburg, and another that Washington has been taken. They are not credited. Richmond is paying off Washington for some of its raids. It is good fun hunting the tiger, but it ceases to be pleasant when the tiger hunts you.

FLOGGING GAROTTERS.—John Croudace and Thomas Allison, who were convicted at the assizes last week of garotte robberies at Sunderland, and sentenced, the former to five years and the latter to ten years' penal servitude, with twenty lashes each, underwent the punishment of flogging at the County Prison on Saturday. The instrument of punishment was manufactured by a sailor, who is undergoing imprisonment in the gaol, expressly for the purpose. The cat is ingeniously composed of nine thongs of stout leather, in each of which are nine knots, and these being connected to a flexible handle, the power, wielded by strong hands, is terrific. At every stroke the knots cut deeply, making flesh and blood fly in every direction. The prisoners were firmly tied up in a reclining position, the lower part of their shoulders exposed, the higher and lower part of their backs being protected by padding. The warders Hodgson and Allison executed their task with the skill of more practised hands. The officials of the gaol were present, but the prisoners were kept in their cells. Hodgson and Allison alternately inflicted ten lashes each on each of the prisoners. The first lash was received with comparative equanimity by each prisoner; but on the second, the yell of deep and excruciating agony which burst forth is represented as indescribable. Their cries continued during the whole of the punishment, and these, together with the sight of the flying flesh and blood, the mangled backs of the sufferers, and the clotted skeins of the cat, made up a spectacle of horror overpowering to those who witnessed it. When the punishment had been inflicted, the prisoners were taken down and removed to the prison infirmary in a state of complete prostration—indeed it is averred that neither of them could have received another lash without the greatest danger. Although the prisoners did not witness the punishment, they could hear the shrieks of the unhappy sufferers in their cells, and it is to be hoped the contemplation of the punishment may have a salutary effect on their minds.—Durham Chronicle.

BUSINESS AT NASSAU.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NASSAU, July 4, 1864.

IN a previous letter I spoke of the difficulty, despite the large population of this island, of obtaining the labour necessary to the proper conduct of its commerce, and demonstrated how it is seemingly the rule with the labouring classes to idle away three-fourths of their time, thus rendering the great advance in wages brought about by the war of but little avail in improving their condition. Before blockade times the wages of labour averaged about 10*d.* per diem, now it is 6*s.*, and the week before last a preconcerted strike took place to enforce the demand of 10*s.* Our quiet little community was somewhat livened up by this event, the more so because the most extravagant threats were indulged in, and some few outrages committed. The time, however, was not happily selected, being just at the close of a 'dark moon,' and when but few boats were in port; the movement, therefore, after a day or two died out, work being resumed at the old rates.

Some few cases of yellow fever having occurred here, the authorities at Wilmington are enforcing a rigid quarantine; the consequence is that most of the boats engaged in the Confederate trade have been transferred to Bermuda, where they will continue running during the summer months. This has, of course, had a depressing effect on business; still prices are pretty firmly maintained, a very heavy demand for goods being anticipated early in autumn.

The arrivals have been few since my last writing, nor do we anticipate but one more 'this moon.' One, however, is particularly noticeable—that of the Little Ada, a small nine-knot boat. She came out on a clear bright night, when the moon was at its full, and with only pine knots for fuel; she was nearly a week at sea, but brought her cargo in safely. We have had no such barefaced arrival as this since the Charleston dredging machine, the Moultrie, successfully ran the blockade with a valuable cargo a few months since—a boat that is now about being devoted to the same uses in our harbour.

The statistics of the 'phantom' commerce for the past month exhibit as follows:—

ARRIVALS.—June 7, Lucy, Wilmington: Edith, ditto; 14, Letter B, ditto; Fox, Charleston; 28, Syren, Wilmington; 30, Annie, ditto; July 2, Will o' the Wisp, ditto.

DEPARTURES.—June 8, Helen, Wilmington; Will o' the Wisp, ditto; 9, Edith, ditto; 23, Fox, Charleston; 24, Jupiter, destination not known; 25, Lucy, ditto; 28, Druid, ditto; 29, Letter B, Wilmington; Letter Rip, destination not known; July 2, Syren, ditto.

Of the above, all sailing up to the 22nd have arrived, showing sixteen successful runs since date of last table. Of disasters we have but two to record—the Georgina McCaw beached, but cargo entirely saved, and it is thought the ship will be also; and the steamer Rose. The latter, a very small vessel, was brought out as a despatch boat by Messrs. Alexander Collie & Co., was entirely unadapted to the business, and, after having been unsuccessfully offered for sale during four or five months past, was despatched seemingly in sheer desperation, and unfortunately captured.

While upon this topic, it would be well to state, for the information of builders and other parties interested, that the 'double screw' boats have all performed admirably, and are rapidly coming to be regarded as superior for the purpose required to all other descriptions.

By the arrival of the Will o' the Wisp we have received Wilmington dates to the 27th ult., but find them barren of news. It is supposed that Grant, after having done the only thing left him to do—i.e. crossing to the south side of James River—by reason of his numerical force has temporarily succeeded in interrupting communication with Richmond; but the confidence in 'Mars Robert' is so unbounded here, that but little anxiety is felt with regard to the result. Rumour (deemed reliable) has it that General Ewell, with his corps of 25,000 men, disappeared from Lee's army about the 22nd ult., conjecture being equally divided as to whether his destination is Washington or Atlanta. I am inclined to the former opinion. General Johnston seems to be yet following the tactics indicated in my letter of the mail before the last, of delaying a general engagement until something more decisive takes place at Richmond. So far, he has succeeded in inflicting upon the enemy terribly heavy losses, while his own have been very light; the death of General Polk, however, has cast a gloom over the entire community. One thing Johnston is successful in at least, and that is in keeping his own counsel, the press in that section of the country being apparently worse informed with regard to his movements than we are in Nassau. The news from the South-west, without being very definite, is still cheering. Hosts of smaller successes are reported, of which Forrest, West, Adams, Lee, and other gallant soldiers, are the heroes.

A WAR CHRISTIAN.—In a recent speech at New York, 'Parson' Brownlow, a representative 'war Christian,' gave utterance to the following horrible sentiments:—'If I had the power, sir, I would arm and uniform in the Federal habiliments every wolf and panther, and catamount and tiger and bear, on the mountains of America; every crocodile in the swamps of Florida and South Carolina, every negro in the Southern Confederacy, and every devil in hell and pandemonium. This war, I say to you, must be prosecuted with a vim and a vengeance until the rebellion is put down, if it exterminates from the face of God Almighty's green earth every man, woman, and child south of Mason and Dixon's line. (Cheers.) The only way to reach the tender sensibilities of a Southern woman is to get after one of her negroes. Kill her husband—she thanks God he died in a good cause; but steal one of her negroes, she will howl and whine as if the devil himself were after her. You have not felt the effects of the war in the loyal State that you are going to now. I know that little man Grant; he is the right man in the right place. I am willing to see Richmond captured by him; and if I had my choice, I should choose that Richmond and Charleston should be taken alone by negro troops, commanded by "Butler the Beast." Sherman has the finest army in the world—not less than 150,000 men all told. He is gradually advancing into the heart of the Southern States. He will take that country. Grant will take Richmond. And we will crowd the rebels, and will crowd them until, I trust in God, we shall rush them into the Gulf of Mexico, and drown the entire race, as the devil did the hogs in the Sea of Galilee. When we come out of the war we shall come out with 500,000 or 600,000 of the best soldiers, who have got their hand in, and would as soon have their hand in a little longer as not. Then I am in favour of giving old England a turn. (Cheers.) We can whip the Southern Confederacy, we can take in France and England—the whole civilised world; and I want to carry it on until we whip out all God's creation.'

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

ON July 9 the Confederates attacked General Wallace, who had taken up a position at Monocacy Bridge after evacuating Frederick. The Federals sustained a heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and retreated to Baltimore in confusion. Mr. Stanton says: 'Our forces were overpowered by the superior numbers of the enemy, and were forced to retreat in disorder, after suffering severe loss.' The Baltimore Correspondent of the New York World, writing on July 10, says: 'Besides the troops originally under Sigel, Tyler, and Mulligan, and those that were at first sent from Baltimore, General Wallace was still further reinforced by large bodies of troops that arrived here on Wednesday and Wednesday night. I do not say what troops these were, or how they arrived here, whether by land or by water, or where they came from. But I do assert that, during the whole of Wednesday night, Thursday, and Thursday night, trains were constantly running from here to Frederick crammed full of troops. On the 8th and 9th, General Wallace must have had a force capable of holding in check forty thousand rebels.' General Tyler, several officers, and 1,000 men were captured.

The Confederates cut the telegraph wires, and for a time prevented telegraphic communication with Washington. They stopped railroad communication between Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. They also destroyed nearly all the bridges on the North Central Railroad. The residences of Governor Bradford and General Cadwalader, near Baltimore, and of Mr. F. O. Blair, near Washington, were burnt.

On the 11th the Confederates were reported within six miles of Washington. On the 13th, after making a demonstration against Fort Stephens, which on the military maps is marked about four miles from the city, the Confederates retired from before Washington. An enormous booty had been sent across the Potomac, and was being conveyed to Richmond, not only by wagons, but by the railroads, which Mr. Stanton lately stated had been destroyed. It was reported, as is usual in such cases, that the Confederates were being pursued, but there had been no conflict, and they were carrying away their spoils unmolested. It was not even certain at the latest dates if all or even any considerable part of the Confederate forces had crossed the Potomac.

It is now admitted that Grant's army had been considerably weakened by the despatch of troops to defend Washington, and it was reported that the Confederates were threatening the Federal lines.

THE Confederates obtained a large booty at Martinsburg. The Wheeling Register of July 9 says: 'We have it from undoubted authority that there were over three million dollars' worth of stores at Martinsburg on Friday last. The telegraph this morning states that Sigel and Hunter were unable to destroy or carry off the stores, and that they fell into the hands of the enemy, and were being taken south by way of Staunton.'

MR. LINCOLN'S call for men to defend the national capital, so far from meeting with an enthusiastic response, has been received with cavilling and coldness. The Mayor of New York formally protests against the militia being withdrawn from the city at this juncture. He writes to General Sandford: 'I entertain grave apprehensions that their withdrawal from the city at a time when the depreciation of our currency is bearing heavily on the mass of our population, might tempt the lawless and evil-disposed to avail themselves of what would seem to them a favourable opportunity for arson and plunder. In such an event, which, in my judgment, I regret to say may not be considered improbable, I fear that our excellent and powerful police would prove inadequate to our protection in the absence of the military.' From Maryland no troops could be obtained. Pennsylvania, so far from showing any alacrity, incurs the angry censure of Governor Curtin. In a proclamation issued on July 10, he writes: 'You are not responding freely . . . it would be disgraceful in you to waste time in objecting to matters of form and detail, or to profess you would go if called in some different way. Those who want an excuse for skulking may do so.' But neither persuasion nor threats brought Mr. Lincoln the much-needed recruits.

MR. LINCOLN'S proclamation suspending the habeas corpus, and declaring martial law in Kentucky, says: 'And whereas, many citizens of the State of Kentucky have joined the forces of the insurgents, have on several occasions entered the said State of Kentucky in large force, and, not without aid and comfort furnished by disaffected and disloyal citizens of the United States residing therein, have not only greatly disturbed the public peace, but have overborne the civil authorities and made flagrant civil war, destroying property and life in various parts of that State. And whereas, it has been made known to the President of the United States, by the officers commanding the national armies, that combinations have been formed in the said State of Kentucky with a purpose of inciting the rebel forces to renew the said operations of civil war within the said State, and thereby to embarrass the United States armies now operating in the said States of Virginia and Georgia, and even to endanger their safety.' Thus Mr. Lincoln bears witness that Kentucky is true to the Confederacy.

MR. LINCOLN is determined that the people of the United States shall understand that his will is supreme in the government of the country. The Federal Congress passed a Bill for the reconstruction of States, the provisions of which were antagonistic to Mr. Lincoln's reconstruction scheme. The President refused to sign this Bill, and on the 8th inst. issued a proclamation on the subject. He announces that he means to abide by the plan he promulgated in December last. At the same time, he will not object to any State trying the Congressional plan, though he declines to be committed 'to any single plan of restoration.' Thus contemptuously does Mr. Lincoln treat the acts of Congress.

A LITTLE before the time that it was reported that the Florida and the Kearsage had been fighting off the coast of Jersey, the former vessel was capturing Yankee ships off the American coast. The most important prize she took was the Electric Spark. This vessel, bound from New York for New Orleans, is of 800 tons burden, and is considered one of the fastest merchant steamers afloat. It was supposed that Captain Morris would commission her as a tender to his ship. On board the Electric Spark were three United States officers, who give a glowing account of the urbanity and courtesy of the Confederate captain. The crew of the Electric Spark was put on board the British schooner Lane, bound for New York, and the Confederate captain paid $720 in gold for their passage. We read in the New York papers that Captain Morris presented each of the United States officers with his carte de visite and a button of his coat.

MR. GIDEON WELLES, the Federal Secretary of the Navy, in thanking Captain Winslow for his services in the destruction of the Alabama, observes: 'The Alabama represented the best maritime effort of the most skilled English workshops. Her battery was composed of the well-tried 32-pounders of 57 cwt.; of the famous 68-pounder of the British navy, and of the only successful rifled 100-pounder yet produced in England.' Mr. Welles knows how to flatter the prejudices of his fellow-countrymen. Somehow or other the triumph of the Kearsage has not produced that jubilation in the North which one might have expected. The news arrived a day too late to add a little brightness to the sombre and depressing celebration of the glorious Fourth. Then there was an uneasy consciousness that the destruction of the Alabama would by no means enable the Federal commercial marine to resume its place on the ocean, an impression which was soon justified by the exploits of the Florida. But the occasion was seized to give expression to the Yankee ill-will against this country. Mr. Welles, in referring to the victory of the Kearsage as a triumph over the naval supremacy of Great Britain, only echoed the unanimous sentiment of the Republican press. The escape of Captain Semmes is very sincerely regretted, and the Federal Government is urged to demand that he should be given up. The New York Daily News and other Democratic papers denounce this folly. The Boston Courier, in an article which we elsewhere publish, satirises the absurd affectation of Mr. Welles in calling the Alabama a pirate, and asks how it happens, if that assumption is true, that Captain Winslow paroled his prisoners?

IN the 6th and the 9th inst. the case against General Dix and others for suppressing the World and Journal of Commerce newspapers, and for arresting the editors and other persons connected with those newspapers, was argued in the Court of General Sessions of New York before City Judge A. K. Russell. Ex-Judge Pierrepont and Mr. W. M. Evarts appeared for the defendants. Mr. Pierrepont argued that General Dix could not be held responsible for the acts charged against him even if they were unlawful, seeing that he had only obeyed the orders of the President. In proof of this he cited Mr. Lincoln's order, dated May 18, which says, 'There has been mischievously and traitorously printed and published this morning in the New York World and the New York Journal of Commerce a false and spurious publication,' and General Dix is commanded forthwith to arrest and imprison, in any fort or military prison in your command, the editors, proprietors, and publishers, . . , and you will hold the persons so arrested in close custody until they can be brought to trial before a military commission for their offence.' The order also directs the suppression of the World and Journal of Commerce. This order General Dix obeyed. On the 20th of the same month he received another order from the President, and in obedience to that he released the prisoners he had arrested and surrendered their offices to them. President Lincoln, as Commander-in-Chief, issued orders to General Dix, which General Dix was bound to obey. Mr. Pierrepont then remarked that, assuming the Governor had a right to question the legality of the proceedings, he had already done all that was necessary to vindicate the majesty of the law. A case had been submitted to the Grand Jury, and that body had refused to indict General Dix and the other defendants on the ground of inexpediency. These, then, were the main points of the defence: first, that General Dix, as a military officer of the Government, was not responsible for any act done by order of the Commander-in-Chief, the President; secondly, a civil tribunal had been appealed to, and had refused to sanction a prosecution. But Mr. Pierrepont remarked that the case had been somewhat changed in character by the action of Governor Seymour, and by the consequent action of President Lincoln. The Governor, after the Grand Jury refused to indict, ordered the District Attorney to prosecute before a magistrate, and the result of that order was that proceedings were taken, and a warrant was issued for the arrest of General Dix and his officers. Upon this the President sent an order to General Dix, telling him that he must not, whilst the war lasts, permit himself to be deprived of his liberty. 'Therefore,' said Mr. Pierrepont, 'it places General Dix in this position, that he has either got to violate the direct order of the President of the United States, as military commander in this department, or violate the order of the process of the courts of civil jurisdiction in this State. The issue is made. There is no escape from it, and it has got to be argued, and we have to see where the law is, and what are the rights under that state of things.' Arguing this point on the 9th instant, the learned ex-Judge contended that during the continuance of civil war the whole of the country was under martial law, although martial law was not proclaimed. He said: 'In consequence of some remarks of the learned Attorney-General the other day in relation to this subject, I call his attention to this fact, that actual war exists in this country; that it is not merely a war in fact, but war as judicially recognised by the Supreme Court of the United States in their recent decisions upon the prize cases. Secondly, the state of actual war in a civilised country is widely different from the state of peace, and the laws of war are widely different from the laws of peace. Many municipal laws which are heard and obeyed in time of peace are silent and voiceless in time of war. Thirdly, the war is not confined to the mere place where the rebel armies encamp, but it touches and affects the entire nation. The state and condition of the entire country is not that of peace, but of war. Fourthly, this is not a foreign war, but a great civil war. It was a state of war in Pennsylvania when Lee's army invaded it, and it was not a state of peace in Pennsylvania when the rebels were driven out. We are not foreign countries; we are one government; and the war is against this one government, and it embraces the entire country. War is our state, not peace. Now, if these States were absolute sovereignties like foreign States, it would be only war in the States. Such is not the fact. The war powers reside in the Federal Government: State Governments have no war powers. But the cry comes up, "Will you surrender all your liberties, and make the President of the United States a dictator? Have we no safeguard over our liberties?" That is somewhat fanciful. You have your remedy. The President may exercise his discretion and judgment in the emergency, and having exercised his powers, if he has transcended them and trampled upon our rights, impeach him, remove him, assassinate him if you will, if he turns usurper; but do not destroy our Government and paralyse it through an imaginary fear that if you do not do it the President will destroy it in some other way by usurpation.'

District-Attorney Hall replied, and after reciting the facts and showing that such acts as were committed by General Dix were not authorised by the Constitution of the United States, challenged the validity of the Indemnity Act passed by the Federal Congress in March 1863. That Act set forth that any order of the President, or any order issued by his authority, should be a sufficient defence for any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal. Congress had no authority to make such a law, and it certainly had no authority to bestow such unlimited power on the President, and to make the executive superior to the fundamental law. This Indemnity Act might be called, said Mr. Hall, 'An Act to authorise the Commission of Wrongs,' but it was unconstitutional and of no force. In 1862, President Lincoln said to the Chicago clergy, 'As Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy in time of war, I suppose I have a right to take any measure which may be best to subdue the enemy.' Mr. Hall dissented from such doctrine, and if it was to be pleaded in this case, the plea was only 'a bold defence of usurpation.'

The Hon. John Cochrane, who was with Mr. Hall, denied that in a state of civil war the whole country passed under martial law. In 1798, martial law was proclaimed in Ireland, because a rebellion was raging there, but England, Scotland, and Wales were not included under it. The Duke of Wellington rightly said that martial law is no law at all, and surely the United States was not reduced to that condition of military extremity and civil exhaustion when the law has no more authority and the will of the general was supreme.

Mr. Evarts for the defence contended that, though there had been no proclamation of martial law, the President had a right to act as though such proclamation had been made. He said:—

> If we were engaged in a foreign war, such proclamation might be required. There was nothing more true than the old maxim, inter arma silent leges. When war raged, all other law than that governing hostilities was necessarily quiescent, wherever the belligerency actually existed. We were not, however, in May last, when the acts for which this examination was brought were committed, under martial law, however, and he should therefore leave the discussion of the question as to whether such martial law was or was not constitutional, which had been so ably and learnedly discussed by the Attorney-General, without any further comment on that head. It would be evident to every mind, however, that a closer authority was necessitated over a country when civil war prevailed there, than was requisite in time of peace and quietude. This authority is necessary to prevent the extension of belligerency, and to close all the avenues of discontent and turbulence. The situation under such a state of things required a much greater restriction of individual action than is permitted in times of peace. But the prosecution had said that until an invasion of the rebels should have actually taken place here, or should be imminently threatened, we could have no state of things here different from that which prevailed in our days of order and peace. Logically speaking, war existed to-day throughout the whole expanse of our territory; and the question that the court is now called upon to decide is, whether the legislation provided for and incident to such a state of war, was constitutional and justifiable.

The Court, after hearing the arguments, fixed August 1 for giving judgment.

IT is reported, but not yet confirmed, that General Sherman has crossed the Chattahoochie and arrived before the defences of Atlanta.

THE New York papers publish extracts from the report of Provost-Marshal Baker upon the 'horrible immoralities of the Treasury harem.' It is an almost incredible record of gross licentiousness. Suffice it to say that the Federal Treasury was a vile den of prostitution. The New York World says: 'It is necessary to add that considerable portions of these same statements are omitted as being too grossly indecent for publication.' We can only add that the portions published are 'too grossly indecent' to be reproduced in any European journal.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN has appointed the first day of August as a day of humiliation and prayer, in compliance with the resolution of Congress. This resolution, which Mr. Lincoln quotes in his proclamation, is a curious document. It exhorts the people to pray that they may not 'be destroyed by the hostilities or connivances of other nations:' and then, so that the world might know that the triumph of the United States over the Confederate States is certain, whether God will it or not, the people are exhorted to pray that the Confederates 'may lay down their arms and speedily return to their allegiance to the United States, that they may not be utterly destroyed.' Such arrogant blasphemy as this is without parallel.

THE correspondent to a New York paper gives a graphic description of the capture by the Confederates of a Baltimore train, in which were General Franklin and his staff. The ladies gave a hearty welcome to their captors, many of whom were Marylanders. It needed not this Yankee testimony to prove the loyalty of Maryland to the Confederacy, and to show that her sons are fighting to defend Southern independence. It is stated that General Franklin has escaped.

THE authorities in Washington have been much scared by the approach of the Confederates. Mr. Lincoln sent for the light-draught monitor Tunca from Philadelphia, rather, it appears, to the disgust of the Philadelphians, who think more of Philadelphia than of Washington.

IT is reported by the United States Consul at St. John's that a band of Confederates have left that place for the State of Maine.

IN New York gold has fluctuated between 250 and 280. On the 16th it was quoted at 252. Mr. Fessenden has asked the bankers for a loan of $50,000,000 until September 1, but at the latest advices he had not succeeded in procuring it.

ENGLAND.

THE annual contest for prizes between the Rifle Volunteers at Wimbledon terminated on Friday last; and on Saturday, as is usual previously to the breaking up of the meeting, a grand Volunteer review was held by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. Hamlet, if the Prince of Denmark were unrepresented, would prove a singularly tame performance. A review from which gunpowder is banished is an affair almost equally unattractive. Still, if any one of the many thousands who had gathered together, whether as actors in the proceedings or merely as spectators, had felt disappointed by the substitution at the last moment of simple field evolutions for the expected sham fight, this feeling was dispelled as soon as the reason for the alteration of the programme became known. The meeting of 1864 had, like the meetings in previous years, proceeded through the greater part of its course without any accident occurring serious enough to interfere with the enjoyment of the busy holiday. On Thursday an event happened which cast a gloom over the camp. The markers at the pool targets did not retire to their huts after luncheon with the usual promptness upon receiving the signal to do so. To attract their attention or hasten their movements, one of the instructors of musketry, Sergeant Roberts, fired a shot in the direction of the butts. He aimed high, but the target at which he fired was unfortunately a pasteboard one, which concealed from view, but could not protect from injury, the marker private Cooper who was behind it. Fears were at first entertained that his case was a hopeless one, but assistance was promptly rendered, and on Saturday he still lived. He was not in a condition to be removed from Wimbledon, but remained till the end of the meeting in the hospital tent, to which he was at first conveyed. The Duke of Cambridge, when he arrived for the purpose of reviewing the troops, sent to enquire after the wounded man, who was reported to be in a precarious state, but it was stated that there were hopes of his recovery provided he could be kept quiet. The Duke, feeling that it was more important to save a life than to contribute to the amusement of the holiday-makers, countermanded the issue of blank cartridges, so that every chance of life might be given to the wounded man, and there was no one who did not approve of that order being given. It is satisfactory to know that this care was not bestowed in vain, and that Cooper is now believed to be in a fair way for recovery. About 10,000 troops of all arms passed in review before His Royal Highness; the number of cavalry was small, but they were handsomely mounted and equipped; the guns were, as usual, splendidly handled, and the infantry went through the movements required of them with an ease and precision scarcely inferior to that displayed by regular troops. In former years the ceremony of distributing the prizes has taken place at the Crystal Palace; but this year a better order of things was inaugurated, the prizes being presented on the ground where they were won. Previously to the review the successful competitors were assembled in front of the encampment, and received at the hands of Lady Elcho the fruit of their skill. Scotland may console herself for her defeat in the competition with Enfield rifles, by finding the Elcho shield (now for the first time making its appearance, though still unfinished) borne home to her. This is the first international contest in which the Scotch have been successful, and they appeared to be correspondingly elated. Sergeant M. Smith, of the 1st Middlesex, whose name has not appeared now for the first time in the list of winners, carried off the Wimbledon Cup, and would also have carried away the silver owl, but that mysterious bird, true to its colours to the last, refused to emerge from obscurity. For the rest the names of the winners present a formidable catalogue, and they, together with the marks which they made and the prizes which they won, are written in the books of the Association. The Wimbledon meeting of 1864 has proved a complete success.

DR. LIVINGSTONE arrived in London on Saturday, having just returned from his African mission, which, notwithstanding his great experience, his courage and address, has proved a complete failure. He was present in the evening at Lady Palmerston's assembly, being introduced by Sir Roderick Murchison. He met with a hearty welcome, and was warmly congratulated on having returned in safety from so perilous an expedition. He has left behind him his little river steamer, the Lady Nyassa. He intends to go out again shortly, and to set forth on another pilgrimage in her.

SATURDAY last being Election Saturday at Eton, the procession of boats and other usual ceremonies took place. The Prince and Princess of Wales honoured the proceedings with their presence. Their Royal Highnesses were rowed up the river in a boat built by Messrs. Searle of Eton, from which they saw the regatta, and also the display of fireworks opposite the Brocas with which the day's amusement terminated about 9 o'clock.

STRANGE as it may appear, the reception accorded by the public to the Oxford declaration seems to have been of such a nature as to encourage other members of the community to follow the clerical example. Certain of our wise men having agreed together to express their belief that the Bible, if exposed to chemical tests and scientific scrutiny, would pass uninjured through the ordeal, drew up a declaration to that effect. This declaration, fortified by several names well known and respected in the scientific world, was forwarded to Dr. Daubeny, Professor of Botany in the University of Oxford. He, however, prudently refused to lend it the sanction of his name. He sympathised, as all Christians must, in the object for which it was drawn up, and the spirit that actuated its promoters; but he considered that, while no similar manifesto was issued by any other lay profession, it was casting a sort of stigma upon men of science, as maintaining that they were peculiarly liable to entertain infidel opinions, neither was he quite prepared to adopt in their entirety the terms of the declaration. Such attempts to control the opinion of others, however well intended, must prove ineffectual; they are also to be deplored as presupposing an amount of infidelity which does not, we believe, exist. However this may be, if the Bible is the word of God, it stands in no need of such support; if it is, as some would have us believe, the invention of men, the declarations of all the clergy and wise men to boot must fail to bolster up its weakness.

JUSTICE at last is being done to the river to which London owes so much of her prosperity. On the 20th of this month the foundation stone of the Thames embankment was laid by Mr. Thwaites, who was accompanied by Mr. Cowper, Lord J. Manners, and other gentlemen who either are promoters of, or take an interest in, the great undertaking. The condition of the Thames has too long been a disgrace to the British capital, and much inconvenience and injury to health have resulted as a consequence of the unclean condition to which it has been reduced. The task of cleansing its waters and rendering its banks not merely useful, but ornamental also, is now commenced in earnest, and when completed we may expect it to prove one of the grandest achievements of the present century. The traffic of the metropolis has for a long time, under the most favourable circumstances, proved too much for its thoroughfares, and whenever one of the main arteries of communication is rendered for a time impassable, the inconvenience and even danger occasioned are far from inconsiderable. To relieve the excessive pressure of the traffic in Fleet Street, and other crowded localities, it has been determined to open a new road running along the banks of the river from Blackfriars Bridge to Westminster. The idea is not a novel one, but the execution of it has only recently been determined upon. The work has been in progress for the last two years, but it is only within the last six months that [illegible] would have been likely to [illegible] convey an idea of the magnitude of the undertaking. It is on the north side of the Thames that the embankment is at present being constructed; whether the southern shore will receive an equal embellishment is a question for further consideration. The river bank is now thronged with workmen busily engaged in [illegible] otherwise preparing for the [illegible] space between the piles and the shore [illegible]. As many as 800 [illegible] through Temple Bar to the river's bank, and so great is the activity displayed, that the work [illegible] placed, and the void [illegible]. The rotten barges which have so long done duty as steamboat piers are to be removed, and will be replaced by handsome stonework [illegible]. From the rapidity with which the works are being carried forward, we may hope that a useless and unsightly mud bank will at no great distance of time be converted into a stately [illegible], and the waters, no longer defiled by the sewage of all the dwellings of a vast city, will once more flow sweetly. Blackfriars Bridge is at present the limit of the eastern end of the embankment. The course of the Thames being somewhat narrow between that point and London Bridge, and the wharves situate within that area being of considerable value, it is doubtful whether it will be expedient to carry it farther in that direction. This will be a question for consideration at a future time; the extent now at present determined upon will be sufficient to afford relief from the evils which we have so long endured. It is calculated that before three years have passed away the work will be completed.

THE inquest on the body of Mr Briggs, adjourned from the 9th instant, was resumed on Monday last. Nothing of any importance transpired. Mr. Lee, a personal friend of the murdered man, repeated the evidence he had previously given before Mr. Henry, to having seen him on the night in question in a railway carriage occupied by two other men, a fact which seems to point to the conclusion that more than one had a share in the murder. This subject still attracts the attention of the police, and constant efforts are being made to gain additional evidence against the supposed murderer, and to discover his accomplice in guilt. A life-preserver has been found concealed in the apartment of Muller, which was identified by a fellow-lodger as his property; it usually was suspended over his bed. It is supposed to have been the weapon used for the commission of the crime, and to have been appropriated for that purpose by Muller in the absence of the owner. As some apprehension exists that the depositions despatched with the officers in the first boat that started in pursuit of Francis Muller, owing to the necessary haste with which they were put together, might not be sufficiently explicit to meet the requirements of the Extradition Treaty with the American States, another officer was despatched armed with another warrant and more complete depositions on board the following mail-boat, one of the fastest steamers in the service, so as to cut off, if possible, all chances of escape from Francis Muller except that of establishing his innocence in a court of justice. A suggestion has been made which appears well worthy of attention, and which will, we hope, be carried out by the Legislature as speedily as possible; it is to establish means of communication between the guard of a train and the passengers. This would not be difficult to accomplish; and when we consider how short a time proved sufficient for the accomplishment of this crime, and the at least temporary escape of the perpetrators of it—when we remember how small the facilities afforded in comparison with those which may be expected in journeys where the different stations are separated by intervals, not of two or three minutes only, but of from ten to twenty, and even more—when we remember the other crimes which are committed, or alleged to be committed, we feel it is necessary that effectual measures should be adopted for preventing the isolation of passengers, and affording additional security to their lives, their persons, and their reputations.

The German arrested at Stafford on suspicion of being concerned in the murder has been discharged, there not being sufficient evidence to justify his detention.

THE valuable library collected by the late Mr. Daniel has been brought to the hammer during the last week. The sale has already occupied six days, and another three are expected to be taken up in disposing of the water colour drawings left by the deceased gentleman. The sale has attracted to a great extent the attention of the curious in old and rare books. Some of them fetched very high prices, especially the Shakspeares, one original edition of which, after some animated bidding, was purchased for Miss Burdett Coutts at upwards of 600*l*.

THE Ministerial whitebait dinner took place on Saturday at Greenwich. Parliament will be prorogued at the end of the week, so that Ministers will be able sooner than they have for many years to 'rest and be thankful.'

WHERE different laws exist for different sections of the same community, [illegible] and much injustice are the result, [illegible] especially when an institution so important as marriage is the subject of the difference. A [illegible] by the notorious Yelverton case, which having been [illegible] over a space of several years in Ireland, Scotland, and England, is at length to be decided this week. We observe that other law proceedings have been [illegible] during the past week by this discrepancy in the laws to which we have alluded. A Roman Catholic priest was indicted for the felonious offence of marrying a Papist and a Protestant. Surely it is high time for such a state of things to be put an end to.

MR. WILLIAM KEMMIS died at his house in Dublin on the 19th inst. The [illegible] gentleman had attained a very advanced age. He was the Crown solicitor, and was remarkable from having been engaged in all the prosecutions for treason which have taken place since the rebellion of 1798 down to the present time. Through him the Sheareses and Emmett were brought to the gallows. He conducted the [illegible] prosecution of Daniel O'Connell, who was sentenced [illegible] to be reversed on [illegible], [illegible] with all [illegible], amenable to the law, and in 1848 Mr. Kemmis conducted the prosecutions which ended the career of Smith O'Brien and his co-adjutors.

THE CONTINENT.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

The terms of the suspension of hostilities between Denmark and the Allies are as follows:—1. Hostilities were to cease, and the blockade to be raised, at midday on the 20th inst.; any captures made after that date to be restored. 2. The suspension of arms to cease at midnight on the 31st inst., without further notice. 3. The forces of both parties to remain in possession of the military positions which they occupied on the 20th inst. The occupation to extend to the sea within cannon-shot of the shore. All communication between the territories occupied by the respective parties to be interrupted. This convention was signed on the 18th inst.; the German Commissioners declined to date the suspension from the day of signature on the pretext that it would not be possible to communicate with the military authorities in time to effect an immediate cessation of hostilities. The Danes, of course, could only submit; though they might have argued that it would be possible to remedy this inconvenience by applying the rule that all captures made after the signature of the convention should be restored. The effect of putting off the truce was that on the 19th inst. an engagement took place off the island of Sylt between the Danish Captain von Hammer and the allied forces, in which the former sank seven gunboats, but was eventually forced to surrender; with him were taken 8 officers, 214 men, 2 steamers, 2 coasting vessels, 10 revenue cutters, and 5 transports. The Germans continue to make preparations for the invasion of Fünen in spite of the armistice; their works can be easily discerned from the opposite shore, for they make no attempt to conceal the fact; but even were it not so, the Danes would not remain long in ignorance of it, so accurate is their information with regard to every movement in the hostile camp.

The Prussians have 'got their eyes in,' to borrow an expression from the cricket-field, to the game of tyranny and arrogance, to such an extent that, wanting a foreign enemy, they have turned round upon and attacked their own kindred. It appears from the Prussian accounts that the Federal garrison of Rendsburg had been guilty of several acts of violence on Prussian soldiers. On the 18th and 19th instant, the Hanoverian troops which form that garrison attacked the Prussian outposts and soldiers, many of whom were wounded in the streets. Tumultuous assemblages gathered even before the hospitals, where many of the wounded Prussians were lying. The Prussian troops were compelled to remain under arms during the night. 'The Commander-in-Chief had certainly taken measures for the prevention of a renewal of similar excesses, but,' says the Norddeutsche Zeitung, 'these fresh symptoms of serious animosity will engage the most earnest attention of the King's Government.' The first symptoms of animosity between the two parties had been shown at a soldiers' ball, in which a row had occurred between a few individuals of the two parties. Accordingly, on the 21st inst., Prince Frederick Charles informed the Federal General von Hake that he had received orders to make himself master of Rendsburg. General von Hake replied that, having only four companies at his disposal, he must yield to superior force, but that he declined all responsibility for the step. Thereupon the town was occupied by a force of 6,000 Prussian troops. General von Hake presented a formal report of the transaction to the Federal Diet, who telegraphed to him their approval of his conduct, and desired him to hand in a formal protest against the occupation. Nine German States have already protested in the Diet, and a commission has been appointed to enquire into the matter. On the receipt of the news in the Chamber of Deputies of Wurtemburg, a resolution was unanimously carried 'solemnly to protest against the forcible occupation, and to request the Government, in conjunction with other States, to oppose this violence, the necessary means for that purpose being granted by the Chamber.' The Norddeutsche Zeitung, as may be gathered from our quotation above, suggested and then defended the violence used. The manner of defence employed is somewhat remarkable. It will be observed that the Federal troops of occupation were Hanoverians, the Norddeutsche Zeitung, therefore, enumerates a long list of grievances which Prussia can bring against Hanover, including difficulties with regard to the Customs, to the railways, and to the telegraph, besides certain incidents in the present war and also in that of 1850. What these accusations, even if well founded, can avail in justifying the conduct of Prussia, it is very hard to see, as the Hanoverian troops were occupying Rendsburg, not in their national but in their Federal character. The fact is that the German nationalism is an utter delusion—a cloak which can be thrown on and off by an unscrupulous man to suit his present requirements. Herr von Bismarck appears to consider that it is at once strong enough to support a European war, and also too feeble to resist his seizure of a town in Federal occupation. It remains to be seen what part Austria will take in the matter. The Emperor is neither dishonest nor weak, but he may be too deeply involved in the guilt of Prussia to permit him to lift up his voice in remonstrance.

Symptoms of the pressure exerted upon the population of the Duchies may be seen by comparing the two following facts. At a meeting of Sleswig landowners which was held at Kiel on the 20th inst., an address was drawn up requesting that the Duchies should be placed ad interim, until the decision of the succession question, under the joint government of Austria and Prussia. On the other hand, the patriotic committees have declared one after the other that a prolongation of the Austro-Prussian provisional government is a direct attack upon the rights of the Duchies, which demand the immediate recognition of the Duke of Augustenburg. Which of these two facts represents to us the real state of the case? Is the Austro-Prussian force exercising an undue influence, or are Federal [illegible] coercing the people? Or, again, shall we rather believe that the people of the Duchies have no wish one way or the other, but are being rocked about from opposite sides by the two rival interests?

T... Academy of France has been engaged lately in awar...ng the Monthyon prizes for virtue. No country but France could support so peculiar an institution; for in no country but that can the peculiar character be found which unites a really exalted feeling with that 'desire to be seen of men' which elsewhere we call vanity. It is to be observed particularly in their military virtues; while we cannot say that a Frenchman will not be brave for his own sake only, it must be confessed that he will be much braver for the sake of the spectators who applaud the deed. The chief prize for virtue, of the value of 3,000 francs, was awarded to Jean Lallray in honour of his shining virtue of hospitality in the most Scriptural sense. He is ready at all times to take in every stranger who presents himself; and the more wretched the visitor is, the more gladly he is received. He sits down daily with some twenty guests, who have literally come in from the high-ways and hedges; he feeds them, and sends them on their way. The second prize of 2,000 francs was given to a female servant, for her devoted attention to the family of her former master, after they had fallen into indigence.

We give the following curious story from the account given by the French journal L'Europe of a meeting of the shareholders of the Caisse des Chemins de Fer. Sixteen hundred shareholders were present on the summons of the well-known M. Mirès. This gentleman ad-dressed them at great length, recounting the dis-asters which he had suffered, and the enormous exertions which he had made to retrieve his position and restore their losses to those who had trusted to him. He then went on to speak of his enemies, who never ceased to attack him, in the hope apparently that he would cease to resist when his financial resources were exhausted; 'but,' he exclaimed, 'they fight against sentiments which are too strong for them;' then, producing a letter from his daughter, the Princesse de Polignac, he read it to a sym-pathizing audience. It was to the effect that she was now in possession of the money settled on her at her marriage, in consequence of the death of her husband, and that she would consecrate it all to the cause of her father's defence, even if it must be swallowed up in the abyss which had already absorbed his whole fortune. M. Mirès, the journal tells us, was able to read this letter through with dry eyes, but his audience were not equally stoical, and many a tear of emotion fell over the expression of such devoted filial love. Mr. Mirès' powers of persuasiveness are well known; but it is hard to believe that even he could have imagined, much less carried out with success, so magnifi-cent and gigantic a humbug.

ITALY.

The history of the Committee of Enquiry into the con-nection of members of the Chamber of Deputies with the South Italian railroad contract is curious and not very creditable. The contract had been originally taken by the leading financier of Europe, who had submitted to the Chamber a memorandum embodying the contract in a set of clauses. It occurred, however, to Count Bastoggi, late Minister of Finance, that the contract was likely to be of the most profitable, and well worth the exertion of ob-taining. It was difficult to wrest it out of the hands of the great firm who then held it, or believed that they held it; a strong determination, however, and a liberal expen-diture conquered the difficulty. Signor Susani, the deputy who drew up the report of the Committee on the con-tract, became at the same time possessor of a very large interest in the contract, and an ardent supporter of Count Bastoggi's wishes; the various members of the Committee also suddenly discovered that they had the greatest possible reason for securing the success of Count Bastoggi. When the day came for the formal discussion of the contract as proposed by the leading firm above alluded to, it was put to the House clause by clause: as each clause came on, it was slightly modified, and a paper was handed up to the Speaker of the House containing Count Bastoggi's ac-ceptance of that clause of the contract as modified. The result was that the whole contract was thus transferred from the firm which originally proposed it to Count Bas-toggi, with a few insignificant alterations. Such very sharp practice could not but excite the gravest attention, and an enquiry was imperatively demanded into the means used by Count Bastoggi to secure the support of the House in a proceeding of such suspicion. The result of the enquiry has been to cast very grave doubts on the probity of many of the members; several of them re-signed before the report of the Committee of Enquiry was published, among others Count Bastoggi and Signor Susani. The report of the Committee was couched in very guarded language, so much so, in fact, as to mislead us in our statement of last week, that all the members of the House had been acquitted of every suspicion of corrup-tion. It appears that many gentlemen, some unfortunately in very high position, have been very largely benefited by the transfer of the contract. Signor Susani in particular appears to have made his fortune (speaking from an Italian point of view) by the affair. The Ministry have determined to bring in a Bill by which the possibility of a recurrence of such corrupt proceedings may be removed. The Chamber of Deputies was prorogued on the 22nd inst., and will very probably be dissolved before it again meets, that it may have an opportunity of 'turning over a new leaf.'

Garibaldi returned to Caprera on the 20th inst. in the steamer Ztavo Palestro; General della Marmora has consequently been released from his watch over the conduct of the great Italian patriot, and has started from Naples on his long-promised tour over the north of Europe. Prince Humbert is expected in Paris shortly.

GREECE.

The islands of Corfu and Zante have returned to the Greek National Assembly deputies belonging to the Con-servative party. They have stated that they will do all in their power to obtain the adoption by the Assembly of the principle that the King not only reigns but governs. It is evident that, now that the islanders have after so much delay obtained a King, they are desirous that he shall in very deed be King, and are not inclined to be governed by the Continental Assembly. The Minister of War has spent certain sums on objects which were not mentioned in the budget, and without demanding a sup-plementary credit. His conduct has been animadverted on by the National Assembly, and a ministerial crisis is imminent.

TURKEY.

By order of the Government, the Protestant missionary establishments have all been closed, and several of their converts arrested. The Bible and American Missionary Societies have, however, since been reopened. It is said that the Protestant movement is spreading very rapidly among the lower orders of the Mussulmans.

A Turkish squadron of one 90-gun liner and two 40-gun frigates have visited Spithead. They are to be con-verted in England into screw steamers.

TUNIS.

The advices from this country are rather contradictory. According to one statement the rebellion is declining. According to another probably more trustworthy report, affairs are still in a very unfavourable state. The Khas-nadar, or Prime Minister, persists in requiring the pay-ment of a tax of 36 piastres. The insurgents have, how-ever, broken up their camp, and the troops of the Bey are in the neighbourhood of Tunis.

MEXICO.

By advices from Mexico, we learn that the entry of the Emperor into his capital was not less satisfactory than the rest of his journey. The population met him with every demonstration of joy, such as would generally be consi-dered to be reserved for private and domestic good fortune. The city was brilliantly draped by day and illu-minated by night; the shops were all closed, and the inhabitants gave themselves up to a three days' festivity. A political amnesty has been proclaimed. On June 15, the Marquis de Montholon presented to the Emperor the letter accrediting him as French representative at the Mexican Court. The Emperor in his reply took occasion to point out that the name of the Emperor of the French was everywhere united with his own in the rejoicings of the Mexican people.

Juarez is losing his last foothold in Mexico: the pro-vinces of Nueva-Leon and Cohahuita, in which he had been enabled to establish a military terrorism, are rising against him. His general, Doblado, has been defeated, and the friends of the new Empire are organising them-selves. The Imperialists, Bruno Lezano and Ugartechea, succeeded in imposing conditions upon the Juarist Quesada; but General Negrete came to his assistance, and shot down the leaders of the movement at Monterey. Measures are now being taken in France for the immediate return of all the troops who are not to remain permanently in Mexico.

PERU.

The differences between Spain and Peru continue to create the greatest excitement in all the States of South America. At Buenos Ayres, especially, a popular assem-bly was held in front of the palace of the Government. The President Mitre presented himself on the balcony to the crowd, and declared that Peru had a just cause, and that he, as chief of the republic, was determined to defend the right—a sentiment which was received with the loudest applause.

The Brazilian Minister has addressed a letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs in Peru, in which he says that Brazil, having been a victim of a similar act of violence (alluding to the seizure of Brazilian merchantmen by British men-of-war), was ready to join Peru in expressing their common indignation at this new infraction of inter-national rights and usages. We mentioned last week a story concerning the theft of Admiral Pinzon's despatches on their way to Europe. This is denied by the Spanish Government, who further state that they have received communications from Chili expressing a desire for friendly relations with Spain. It appears that there is a very good chance that the Spanish squadron now in possession of the Chincha islands will be starved out; the visit of the Spanish gunboat to the port of Callao, which we men-tioned in our last number, is supposed to have some reference to their want of food. It is said that at the last cabinet council at Madrid it was determined to act energetically to obtain complete satisfaction from Peru.

Appropriate.—That undaunted champion of the Federal cause, Professor Goldwin Smith, has at last found an appropriate, though scarcely a complimentary, analogy to the conduct of his clients. He virtually compares them to Sepoys, but he does so in the most amiable and well-intentioned way, consi-dering the Sepoys a much abused and badly calumniated people. In his last letter to the Daily News, of July 25, he says:—'We all remember the stories of English women mutilated by the Sepoy mutineers, which were so universally believed at the time, and which, it is to be feared, helped to stimulate our soldiers to acts of atrocious and cold-blooded vengeance, such as, when they are published to the world, will leave a dark stain upon our fame. In this case we seemed almost to have the testimony of eye-witnesses to the facts. We had everything, apparently, necessary to conviction but the names. Yet when the names were called for, the whole story proved to be a mere figment generated by the heated fancy of the panicstricken and infuriated population of Calcutta. I suspect the fancy of the people of Richmond is just as heated now as that of the people of Calcutta was then, and equally capable of generating hideous and delirious untruths.'

A Northern View of Federal Prospects.—The Philadelphia Mercury writes: 'It really seems to us that we have nearly reached the end of a career of wasteful expenditure and false financial policy—that the bottom has quite fallen out of the Federal Exchequer—and that the whole Government is doomed to go down to the ground in dishonoured and helpless prostration. Then must come repudiation of the national debt, loss of credit, inability to perform the functions of administra-tion, and a total paralysis of the central political organism.'

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE WAR IN AMERICA AND MEDIATION.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Lindsay, before putting the question of which he had given notice, said he had desired to have made a statement, containing some important facts bearing upon the American war, and tending to show how futile was the attempt to restore the Union and to coerce the South; but as he had no opportunity now of doing so, he begged simply to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, considering the great sacrifice of life and property occasioned by the war still raging between the United States of America and the Confederate States, and considering the loss the people of this country have suffered by the war, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the other Powers of Europe, to use their endeavours to bring about a suspension of hostilities.

Lord Palmerston said: I can assure my hon. friend that Her Majesty's Government deeply lament the great sacrifice of life and property in America and the distress which that war has produced in this country. But we have not thought that in the present state of things there was any advantage to be gained by entering into concert with any other Powers for the purpose of proposing or offering mediation, or of negotiating with the Government of the United States or of the Confederate States to bring about a termination of this unhappy war.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, Lord Campbell asked whether the Treaties by which Slesvig was guaranteed to Denmark and the Treaty of 1852 were valid. He maintained that England was still bound by them, and if they were violated with impunity very grave evils would result. Earl Granville replied that the old Treaties were cancelled by the war between Denmark and England, and that the treaty of 1852 contained no guarantee.

On Tuesday the Earl of Ellenborough delivered a long and eloquent speech on the altered state of foreign affairs since the beginning of the session. That change, he observed, affected not only the dignity of the Danish monarchy, which all the Powers had years ago thought essential to the peace of Europe, but also the validity of treaties, the security of the weaker States, and, above all, the progress of constitutional principles on the Continent. He regretted the decision of the Government and Legislature not to grant active aid to Denmark; and, although he had no hopes of influencing that policy, he could not help saying that it was one which none of the more famous Ministers of this country would have adopted, and it would have been possible in no previous reign except that of James I. Such a policy ought not to be followed by any country that desired to be great. Next, reviewing the conduct of the German Powers, the noble Earl said that the real object of the Prussian Government was to arrest the growth of constitutional liberty in Denmark, and, finding that they could act with impunity, they had brought about the existing state of things. Referring next to the alleged revival of the Holy Alliance, he remarked that, although there might be no foundation for the assertion, still he believed there was a much worse understanding between the three despotic Powers. The first Holy Alliance was a combination of princes against democracy and revolution, and not a conspiracy against their weaker neighbours; but the object of these princes now went much further. It was unreasonable to expect that a British Minister would be always successful in his negotiations, but the country had a right to demand that his proceedings should not render success impossible. The Government had brought in peace estimates, and by their declaration had deprived their diplomacy of its only support. But, having done this, he had a right to complain that they had interfered everywhere and in the most unpleasant manner. He regarded the late Conference as little better than a farce. Its result in transferring Slesvig to Germany destroyed the balance of power, and if the proceedings of the German Powers were to be sanctioned, how was any arrangement hereafter to be effected? The precedent of to-day would be the rule of to-morrow, and there would be no security left except force for the possession of its dominions by any Power. Thus, if the Germans wrested Kiel from Denmark, what security was there that they would not proceed to treat Holland in the same manner? Beyond this, he saw in this matter a declaration of war on the part of the despotic Powers against the advance of constitutional principles in Germany. They saw there how the constitutional movement in Prussia was likely to terminate, and, although the policy was a wicked one, it was no doubt clever; but he trusted that its present success would not be permanent, for such things could not be done without retribution, terrible and overwhelming as an avalanche. Under these circumstances, all this country could do was to rely upon its own strength, and revive that ancient patriotic spirit which did not consider lucre the only pursuit worth following.

Earl Russell defended the policy of the Government, and expressed an opinion that, as soon as the affair with Slesvig was settled, the constitutional progress of Germany would be in no danger. If England had rushed into war on behalf of Denmark, and had arrayed the Great Powers against each other, a heavy blow would have been inflicted on the liberties of Europe.

Lord Stratford de Redcliffe thought Earl Russell ought not to have censured Denmark so severely for not fulfilling every condition of her treaties with Germany, seeing the delicate and difficult position in which the Danish Government was placed.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

On Thursday, in the Commons, 'in Committee of the whole House'—there were about a dozen members present—Sir C. Wood made his annual statement of the revenue and expenditure of India. For the year ending April 1863, instead of a deficit as in years past, there was a surplus of 1,800,000*l.*, and for the year ending in April 1864, there was a surplus of 257,000*l.*, and for the current year it was expected that there would be a surplus of 823,000*l.* This result had been accomplished mainly by the reductions effected in Indian expenditure, and notwithstanding a considerable remission of the extra taxation imposed during the mutiny. In addition to this, a large amount of debt had been discharged, consisting of a temporary loan in this country of one million and a half; India bonds, a quarter of a million; and India debentures, five millions and a half; so that there had been paid off in this country in the course of the last year 7,313,000*l.*, and 1,000,000*l.* in India; or a total of 8,313,000*l.* Further, this had been produced without reducing the estimated balance in the Indian Treasury, which, including 4,500,000*l.* at home, now amounted to 19,000,000*l.* The various sources from which the revenue was derived—opium, salt, customs, and land—were all in a healthy and thriving condition during the year; and there had been an increased expenditure of one million for public works, half a million for the improved survey and assessment for the land revenue, with a view to facilitating the purchase and transfer of land, and a further half million for the administration of public justice. Respecting the cotton trade of India, Sir C. Wood spoke as follows:—

Rather exaggerated expectations were, at the outset, entertained as to what could be done at once in procuring cotton from India. In no country is it possible that the permanent supply shall very much exceed the permanent demand. If people cannot sell produce, they will not grow it. After the experiment tried some years ago of growing cotton for the English market in India, which was entirely superseded by the supply of superior quality from America, and the great loss thereby caused to the growers in India, it is not surprising that they were not ready to produce on demand a large quantity of cotton, which but for that sudden emergency would not have been required from them. The effect of the sudden demand was to bring out all the old stores of cotton, much of it of very inferior quality. It is said that even mattresses and beds were ripped open, and that the cotton inside of them was sent to this country. There was thus a considerable increase in the supply of cotton; but, in order to test the amount of production, we must compare the amount we got last year with the amount received in the year before, and not in the year after the increased demand. Even before the extraordinary demand there was a considerable growth in the amount of the supply. In 1858 the quantity of cotton imported from India was 1,185,000 cwt.; in 1859, 1,717,000 cwt.; in 1860, 1,822,000 cwt.; in 1861, 3,295,000 cwt.; in 1862, 3,505,000 cwt.; in 1863, 3,878,000 cwt. Last year I quoted one of the best publications I have seen on the production of cotton in India—letters addressed to a Bombay newspaper by a cotton broker, Mr. Smith, of Liverpool, who travelled over a considerable part of India, and made some very sensible observations. Mr. Smith stated very truly that it was absurd to expect a sudden rise in the supply; but if prices were kept up there would be ultimately a gradual increase in the production of cotton. Referring to the accounts of the importation of cotton into this country for the first five months, ending on May 31, the House will see that there has been a steady and remarkable increase in the following years. In the five months of 1858, 1859, and 1861 respectively, the cotton imported from India amounted to about 340,000 cwt. In the five months of 1861 it was 342,000 cwt.; 1862, 731,000 cwt.; 1863, 962,000 cwt.; 1864, 1,247,875 cwt. We are fairly entitled, therefore, to say that the production of cotton in India and its importation into this country have been pretty nearly quadrupled in these years. In Berar, Nagpore, and the other cotton districts of Central India, the number of acres under cultivation in 1861 was 380,000; in 1862, 427,000; and in 1863, 588,000. Similar progress, I have no doubt, is observable in other parts of India where cotton can be grown. On the score of quantity, therefore, we have every reason to be satisfied with what India has done for us in regard to cotton. I am afraid, however, I cannot say as much as to the improvement in the quality of the cotton. That is, of course, necessarily a much slower process. The grower who receives a high price by weight, has in many cases been tempted to enhance the weight and his profit by unfair means. So great did the evil become that the Bombay Government passed an Act for preventing the adulteration of cotton; and from the report of the inspector who was appointed to carry out the law, I understand he has been very successful in accomplishing that object. The main difficulty consists in preventing the mixing of different qualities of cotton. Superior and inferior kinds are grown in the same field, and great care is required, both in sowing the seed and in picking the pods, to prevent a mixture. I have no doubt that when the Indian growers find that they can get a higher price for a better quality they will be clever enough to produce a superior kind of cotton.

After an uninteresting discussion the resolution was agreed to. Mr. G. Duff made some insulting remarks as to the oratory of Sir C. Wood, describing him as 'a Minister to whom Heaven had denied not only the power of lucid statement, but almost the gift of articulate speech,' and he concluded by saying that 'he had listened year after year to the speeches of the right hon. Baronet, and he had never heard him make a speech which would be in any respect satisfactory if it appeared as an anonymous article in the pages of a quarterly review.' [We submit the same observation applies to nearly all the speeches delivered in Parliament, and most assuredly to the speeches of Mr. G. Duff.]

THE NEW HOLY ALLIANCE.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe called attention to the reported revival of the Holy Alliance, and reviewed the circumstances that made the report credible. He urged that this country should cultivate alliances that would enable us to frustrate the designs of despots.

Earl Russell did not deny the importance of the subject, but he did not think the correspondence in the Morning Post was genuine. He did not think that a Holy Alliance was a source of danger to England, or that the members of it had any other intention than to check the progress of democracy in their own dominions. No doubt it was our interest to be closely allied with France. It so happened that very lately there was a question of very great importance and delicacy under discussion, as to what was to be done with regard to the Danubian Principalities. Her Majesty's ambassador at Constantinople and the ambassador of the Emperor of the French entirely concurred in the settlement of that question. They, with the Grand Vizier and other ministers of the Porte, agreed upon a plan which was approved of by the conference, and though the question was one which threatened an immediate disturbance of the peace of Turkey, if not of the peace of Europe, it was amicably settled by means of wise and judicious proposals. He (Earl Russell) could not help remarking how much Her Majesty's Government, in co-operation with the French ambassador, had been able to do in obtaining the settlement of that question, and the answer to his despatch, read to him to-day, from M. Drouyn de Lhuys, expressed the hope that the accord between France and Great Britain on this important subject might be the harbinger of their agreement on such important subjects as might in future come before them. Her Majesty's Government heartily hoped it might be so; he was sure there was nothing more conducive to the benefit of Europe than good agreement between England and France, and while that agreement should subsist he did not himself feel the least apprehension of the revival of the Holy Alliance, even though the sovereigns who formerly constituted it should be so ill advised as, regarding the state of feeling in Europe, to enter into so inauspicious a combination.

GOVERNMENT MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Cobden moved—'That the recent great extension of Government manufacturing establishments calls for the attention of the Government. That it is expedient that steps be forthwith taken to place each separate establishment as nearly as possible on the footing of a private manufacturing company or a public company, by taking a valuation of the fixed and floating capital employed, including the value of the land, and that upon this basis there be an annual stock-taking; when, after making all the customary deductions for depreciation of buildings, machinery, and plant, interest of capital, rates and taxes, and other charges, such as should be charged to the Government departments for articles supplied as shall preserve the capital intact; and that these accounts, with a balance sheet, be laid annually on the table of this House.' Mr. Cobden made a long and able statement, and endeavoured to prove that the work turned out by private enterprise was cheaper and better. In the course of the discussion that ensued, the Marquis of Hartington remarked that in great emergencies when credit system failed, and Government manufactories were indispensable. The resolution was withdrawn; but the subject is to be brought forward early next session.

THE RESIGNATION OF MR. LOWE.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston moved that the resolution which was passed on April 12th, and in consequence of which Mr. Lowe resigned his office, should be rescinded. The resolution inferred that the reports of the School Inspectors had been unfairly mutilated. But the report of the committee appointed by that House to enquire into the matter stated that there was no partiality or unfairness manifested. The motion for rescinding the resolution was agreed to.

Northern Repudiation.—The New York Correspondent of the Times, under date of July 3, writes:—'An appeal by the Governor of New York to the merchants, bankers, and other wealthy citizens, to advance, by way of loan to the State, the sums necessary to pay in gold the interest upon the debt held by Englishmen and other foreigners, has had little effect. Not above a quarter of the necessary funds has been thus provided for, and the whole proposal has fallen to the ground and been abandoned by the Chamber of Commerce, the body which first took up the subject as a matter of public duty and promised to carry it to completion. It appears that some portion of the principal has already been paid off in greenbacks, and for that reason the Chamber has decided that it is of no use to pay the interest of the remainder in gold—i.e., the debtor having done partial injustice, it is better that he should continue to do injustice than that he should clear himself open to the accusation of inconsistency by suddenly becoming honest. Governor Seymour, however, may claim the merit of having seen the right course and dared to pursue it, and may leave to the Legislature the shame of a quasi repudiation, and to the mercantile community of this great city the portion of the disgrace as is implied in its tacit acquiescence in that which it knows to be dishonourable, and the stain of which it might have removed if it had been half as much in love with the public credit as with private money-making. The great State of Ohio has had even less shame than New York, and has repudiated the obligation of paying in gold a debt contracted in gold, without so much as a remonstrance from any constituted authority entitled to speak in its name. Yesterday week the auditor, Secretary of State, and Attorney-General of Ohio, constituting the Board of Fund Commissioners, arrived in this city to pay the semi-annual interest of the Ohio public debt, due on July 1, a debt amounting to about $13,000,000, the most part held in England and Germany. They paid in greenbacks, and thus tender to the foreign creditor a composition, at the then rate of gold, of 40 cents on the dollar or eight shillings on the pound sterling. This may no doubt be called either robbery or repudiation; but it is marvellously like the one, and is certainly a very considerable stride towards the other. At some future day, perhaps, New York and Ohio may be again in want of funds to carry out some project of internal improvement or public utility, and may issue proposals to the capitalists of Europe to advance them gold on as good security as New York or Ohio can offer. But if, under such circumstances, Englishmen and Germans do not button up their pockets, they will deserve to lose their money, and will merit as little sympathy as any bumpkin at a fair who permits himself to be swindled by a ring-dropper.'

The Strength of the Confederacy.—The Times, Monday, in a leading article, observes: 'We have never heard that Charleston or Richmond has been thrown into such alarm as Baltimore and Washington have felt for several days. The Confederacy is more formidable as an enemy than ever. The Government can engage Grant and his enormous army while it stretches its arm over him and deals a blow in the North itself that is felt in every section of society. In the lower classes of the community there appears to be beginning a dim consciousness of the real state of things. The mass of the people have filled the ranks of the army again and again; they have fought bravely, and given their lives freely; but they cannot endure a continual effort that has no result, or brings only calamity, and they now begin to shrink from the useless sacrifice.'

THE CONFEDERATE MANIFESTO.

(From the Morning Post, July 22.)

If the South have not yet defeated the North so finally and completely in the field as to have compelled them to make peace and desist from their hopeless enterprise, they have at all events so decisively and utterly defeated them in the logic of the controversy from the very commencement of the contest as to have left their unreasoning adversaries, as the lawyers say, not a leg to stand upon. What the North rely on is evidently mere brute force and superiority of numbers. This they appear to believe will overcome justice and reason in controversy, as well as strategic genius and all the resources of chivalrous bravery and military science in the field of battle. Still the impartial spectator can hardly bring himself to believe that the North do not know that they are beaten. On the contrary, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that those among them who are not totally incompetent to form any sort of rational opinion on the matter must be convinced that their project of subjugation has utterly failed. In the American news which we have recently published, allusion is made to a manifesto issued by the Congress of the Southern Confederacy. This document comes very opportunely at a highly critical juncture, and possesses considerable interest. It places secession in its true light, and accurately defines the case of the South as against the North. To the mind of the historical student it forcibly suggests the famous Declaration of Independence, the original publication of which some now living in the Southern as well as in the Northern States may be able to remember. That famous manifesto is not yet ninety years old, and we believe there are Americans who are a hundred years old and even more.

This new declaration of independence is not issued in a controversy with a king by revolted subjects who owed him their allegiance, but by eight millions of Republicans as a statement of their case against a number of their fellow-citizens and equals, who, without any claim or pretence to their allegiance, have assumed to treat them as rebels and traitors for withdrawing from a voluntary union or partnership at will, which from its very nature ceased to be binding the very moment there was a cessation of that 'consent' on the part of those who had entered into it, which was essential to its maintenance. The manifesto begins with acknowledging the responsibility of the South 'to the opinion of the civilised world'—which, we may remark in passing, the North have so ostentatiously disregarded—'to the great law of Christian philanthropy'—equally set at defiance by the North—and 'to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, for the part they have been compelled to bear in the sad spectacle of war and carnage which the American continent for the last three years has exhibited to the eyes of afflicted humanity.' The Confederates 'deem the present a fitting occasion to declare the principles, the sentiments, and the purposes by which they have been and are actuated.' They advert to the fact that this war is on their part a purely defensive war, forced upon them against their will. They want nothing but to be left free to govern themselves and manage their own affairs as they deem best. They do not wish to interfere with the Northerners or their affairs in any way whatever. Among the inherent inalienable rights of man are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and it is in defence of these rights, and for nothing else, that they are fighting. The North have only to cease attacking them, destroying their property, devastating their country, and slaying their citizens like sheep, and the war will be at an end at once. They allude to the many and brilliant victories they have gained, to the repeated and disastrous reverses of the North, not as such, not as glorious triumphs on the one side and humiliating defeats on the other, but simply as facts to show that eight milllions of people, united in the firm resolution to maintain their freedom and independence, can neither be reduced to slavery nor exterminated by the sword.

'We do not,' they say, 'recur to these successes in any spirit of vain boasting, but in humble acknowledgment of that Almighty protection which has vouchsafed and granted them. The world must now see that eight millions of people, inhabiting so extensive a territory, with such varied resources, and such numerous facilities for defence as the benignant bounty of nature has bestowed upon us, and animated with one spirit to encounter every sacrifice of ease, of health, of property, of life itself, rather than be degraded from the condition of free and independent States into which they were born, can never be conquered.' They then pass on to the statement of the great principle on which they take their stand. The revolted British colonist of 1776, who were the lawful subjects of England, owing allegiance to the British Government, had no such argument to urge. 'On this continent, whatever opinions may have prevailed elsewhere, it has ever been held and acknowledged by all parties that government, to be lawful, must be founded on the consent of the governed.' The manifesto shows how the Confederates were forced to dissolve their Federal connection with the North by the aggressions of the latter on the fundamental principles of the compact of partnership which subsisted between the States of the American Union. 'In doing so,' they state, 'we exercised a right consecrated in the great charter of American liberty—the right of a free people, when a Government proves destructive of the ends for which it was established, to recur to the original principles and to institute new guards for their security.' The independence of each of the States constituting the American Union, as an individual sovereign State, coequal with the rest, and joined with its fellows in a free and voluntary federation, is a fact which appears on the face of the American Constitution. Under these circumstances, with the independence and sovereignty of each State entire and unsurrendered, the idea of applying to communities so constituted and organised the ordinary rules for coercing and reducing rebellious subjects to obedience is accurately described as 'a solecism in terms, as well as an outrage on the principles of public law.'

There is no possible answer to this. It cannot even be evaded except by the silence of the advocates who should have undertaken to sustain the case of the North. The war, therefore, stands convicted of being on the part of the Federals purely a war of aggression, alike unreasonable, unjust, and unnecessary, as well as preeminently unsuccessful in its conduct and impracticable and hopeless in its aims. The Confederates have neither interfered, nor do they seek to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the Federals or their affairs. With the internal peace and prosperity of the States now seeking to enslave or massacre the Southern people, to burn their towns, and reduce their country to a wilderness, the Confederates do not want to meddle in any way whatever. They do not desire to do to the North as the North are doing to them. They have no revenge to gratify. They will be content with simply being let alone.

Assuredly this evinces unexampled moderation and self-command. All they ask is 'to be left to themselves in the enjoyment of those inalienable rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" which their common ancestors declared to be the equal heritage of all the parties to the social compact.' Only let the North cease from its war of extermination and destruction, and they will be satisfied. If there are any questions which require adjustment by negotiation, the South reiterate that they are now, as they always have been, ready to enter into arrangements with the North 'in a spirit of peace, of equity, and manly frankness.' They are not afraid to avow a strong desire for peace, conscious as they are of their ability to hold their own if the North persist in prosecuting this wicked war, and they 'commit their cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflections of their adversaries, and to the solemn and righteous arbitrament of Heaven.'

THE RESOURCES OF THE SOUTH.

(From the Boston Courier.)

Among the many errors into which our people have been led in regard to the power of the Southern States, there are none more fallacious or productive of more disappointments than the opinions which have been indulged in, that the South within a brief period must be exhausted, both of supplies and men for the army.

With such an immense territory, fertile fields and favourable climate, the South can sustain in the field at least as large a proportion of its population as any people upon the face of the globe. Taking the limit of one out of ten of the people for the army, there is no doubt but the remaining nine-tenths can sustain such an army for an indefinite period. Experience thus far tends to confirm this view. Our people each year of the war have discussed the probability of rebel destitution, and predicted that it was impossible for the South to provide for its armies another year. But the succeeding season has invariably shown the falsity of the previous prophecy, and by general consent the exhaustion has been postponed to another year. This year we have heard less of it than in any preceding one. Our people are learning their mistake, and acquiescing in the fact that the rebellion cannot be brought to a close through starvation.

The same opinion has been entertained in regard to men. The South was exhausted in 1861, in 1862, and completely so in 1863; yet 1864 witnesses the rebel army in as formidable numbers as ever, and in greater efficiency.

The fact is that the South has never approximately exhausted its fighting population. Supposing that this composed but one in ten of the whole number. The growth of the population will make up the losses in the war, so that if the South had to-day its entire efficient fighting force in the field, it would have an army of at least from 600,000 to 800,000 men. The highest estimate of the effective veteran force of the South is 300,000 soldiers—not one half of the effective men. If the statement of Henry Wilson is to be relied on, we must have entered upon the campaign of this year with nearly one million of men in our armies. This would make an army three times as large as that of the rebels, and a larger proportional draft on our population than they have made. With the vastly superior numbers required in invading a hostile territory, and in holding strategic points, and even whole States, notwithstanding the great numerical superiority of our army, we have rarely been able to meet the enemy with superior force. This difficulty increases, and will increase with our advance. These are facts that our people should look at and understand. It is in no way for the interest of the country that they should delude themselves or be deluded. If the war is to go into another year, which the Administration leaders seem to assume, we must expect to raise not only as large, but larger forces than we have done heretofore, to cope successfully with the enemy. The enemy will not be exhausted in their means of supporting an army, or in men, another season. Upon this our people may rely, and they should govern themselves accordingly.

A Federal Order.—The following special order was issued at Memphis on the date named:—'Headquarters, District West Tennessee, July 6.—Whereas railroad trains from Memphis to Saulsbury (on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, fifty-eight miles from Memphis) have been fired into frequently by Confederate soldiers and guerillas within the last few days; and whereas there are many persons along the line of the railroad and at Memphis, who approve and encourage such murderous proceedings: It is ordered that forty of the most prominent and bitter Secessionists in and between Memphis and Lagrange be arrested, and that twenty of them each day be placed on the cars, in the most conspicuous positions, one being placed each side of the engines; and no train will be allowed to leave Memphis without a Secesh guard until this murderous business is desisted from. It is known that several citizens of Memphis have publicly applauded this firing upon trains. They will be given prominent positions on the cars. Quarters will be fitted up for them at White Station, where they will be tenderly cared for when not on duty on trains. Brigadier-General Hatch, commanding the cavalry division, is intrusted with the execution of this order. By order of Major-General C. C. Washburne.' A Memphis despatch of the 7th states that the excitement produced by the order was intense. A number of leading citizens had been arrested and put under guard.

The Peace Resolution moved by Mr. Davis of Kentucky.—The following is a copy of the 'joint resolution to restore peace among the people of the United States,' which was recently offered in the Senate by Mr. Davis of Kentucky, but ruled out of order at that time, and was not entertained or considered:—'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: That three years of civil war, in which the enormous expenditure of blood and treasure has no parallel in the world's history, and whose wide-spreading rapine and diabolical cruelties have shocked Christendom, and which, from alternating success, has produced no essential results, prove that war was not the proper remedy for our national troubles. Resolved: That if the people of America would save and restore their shattered Constitution, and avert from themselves and their posterity the slavery of a military despotism and of a public debt, the interest upon which all the avails of their labour and economy will never meet, they must bring this war to a speedy close. Resolved: That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorised to propose a cessation of arms and an amnesty to the authorities of the Confederate States of America, with a view to a convention of the people of all the States to reconstruct the Union; and if that cannot be effected, then that said convention agree upon the terms of a separation of the States without the further effusion of blood, and of a lasting peace among them.'

DESTRUCTION OF THE ALABAMA.

(From the New York Daily News, July 8.

The Alabama cannot be captured. No beam, or plank, or spar, or rope, or sail of the famed sea rover will ever be a trophy in the hands of her enemies. The ocean that has been the scene of her career protects her now for ever. She seemed fated to baffle and defy in disaster as well as in success. There is sometimes glory in misfortune and triumph in defeat. The words of the dying Lawrence, urging resistance against hope, are more memorable than the records of his victories. The fate of the Alabama will be a theme for admiration with friend and foe, and we venture to prophesy that many a pen that has been active in denouncing her career will acknowledge a certain sublimity in its close.

The commercial welfare and the naval reputation of the North are certainly most beholden to the commander of the Kearsage and his subordinates for their successful efforts to destroy this formidable enemy. But they 'have scotched the snake, not killed it.' All accounts state that the Alabama had suffered severely by the wear and tear of her active existence. She had lost much of her capacity for mischief, and her speed was reduced, and she was, in fact, worn out with hard service, and in absolute need of such repairs as no neutral port would furnish. It was the indomitable spirit, the untiring zeal, and the splendid management of Captain Semmes, that still rendered her formidable. That spirit, that zeal, and that capacity for management are yet in the service of the Confederacy. The happy star of Semmes watched over him after the last plank sank beneath him. He, too, escaped capture. The romantic attributes of the fight off Cherbourg Harbour, and its thrilling dénouement, will but serve to add to his renown, and popularity with friends of the South. There is more éclat attached to his name by the circumstances of his defeat than by the long list of his successes. A public dinner was tendered him immediately upon his arrival at Southampton after the engagement. The finale of the Alabama's remarkable career will attract public attention and enlist public sympathy in England. Captain Semmes will be lionised, fêted, and encouraged. We doubt not that before long a second Alabama will be at his command. Meanwhile her commander has lost no prestige. He has sacrificed, perhaps, a little of his reputation for sagacity in risking an encounter with an opponent far his superior in speed, armament, and strength of build; but human nature is more apt to sympathise with reckless daring than to condemn it. He has saved a handful of his men, who will serve as a nucleus for another crew; and there will be no lack of adventurous characters ready to serve the man who fought his ship till her guns were under water, and then committed her to old Neptune's eternal embrace, leaving no vestige behind but the record of her deeds.

Lincoln upon the Battle-Field.—We see that the papers are referring to the fact that Lincoln ordered a comic song to be sung upon a battle-field. We have known the facts about the transaction for some time, but have refrained from speaking them. As the newspapers are now stating some of the facts, we will give the whole. Soon after one of the most desperate and sanguinary battles, Mr. Lincoln visited the commanding General and the army. While on his visit, the commanding General with his staff took him over the field in a carriage, and explained to him the plan of the battle, and the particular places where the fight was most fierce. At one point the commanding General said, 'Here on this side of this road five hundred of our brave fellows were killed, and just on the other side of the road four hundred more were slain, and right on the other side of that wall five hundred rebels were destroyed. We have buried them where they fell.' 'I declare,' said the President, 'this is getting gloomy. Let us drive away.' After driving a few rods, the President said, 'This makes a feller feel gloomy. Jack' (speaking to a companion), 'can't you give us something to cheer us up? Give us a song, and give us a lively one.' Thereupon Jack struck up, as loud as he could bawl, a comic negro song, which he continued to sing while they were riding off from the battle-ground, and till they approached a regiment drawn up, when the commanding General said, 'Mr. President, wouldn't it be well for your friend to cease his song till we have passed this regiment? The poor fellows have lost more than half of their numbers. They are feeling very badly, and I should be afraid of the effect that it may have on them.' The President then asked his companion to stop his singing till they got by that regiment. We know that this story is incredible, that it is impossible that a man who could be elected President of the United States, could so conduct himself over the fresh-made graves of the heroic dead. When this story was told to us we said that it was incredible—impossible, but the story is told on such authority that we know it to be true. We tell the story that the people may have some idea of this man, Abraham Lincoln, who is a candidate for four years more of such rule. If any Republican holds up his hands in horror, and says this story can't be true, we say we sympathise with him from the bottom of our soul; the story can't be true of any man fit for any office of trust, or even for decent society; but the story is every whit true of Abraham Lincoln, incredible and impossible as it may seem.—Essex Pennsylvania Statesman.

Worth Remembering.—The following resolutions passed the United States House of Representatives, Feb. 11, 1861, by a nearly unanimous vote:—'Resolved: That neither the Federal Government nor the people or Governments of the nonslaveholding States have a purpose or a constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union. Resolved: That those persons in the North who do not subscribe to the foregoing proposition are too insignificant in numbers and influence to excite the serious attention or alarm of any portion of the people of the Republic, and that the increase of their numbers and influence does not keep pace with the increase of the aggregate population of the Union.'

In a Chancery suit concluded last week, Messrs. Sampson, Low, & Co., purchasers of the copyright of 'Haunted Hearts,' a book written by Miss M. S. Cummins, an American authoress resident in Canada, sought to restrain Messrs. Routledge from publishing the same work. The latter contended that Miss Cummins, as an American citizen, had no claim to the benefit of the English law of copyright, though resident in a part of the British dominions. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley decided that, on principle, a foreigner publishing under the circumstances stated was entitled to the benefit of the Act; but in the particular case before the Court the assignment of the publishers was invalid from non-compliance with some technical points as to accuracy of registration.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JULY 28, 1864.

The Invasion of the Northern States.

IF we can credit the Federal accounts General LEE has just brought the most brilliant operation of the war to a successful close. With an air of triumph the Northern press announces that 'the invasion is at an end.' Baltimore is still held in thrall; President LINCOLN is still safe in the White House; and the whole North breathes more freely, like a man suddenly relieved from the sense of imminent and deadly peril. We see no reason to doubt the general purport of the latest intelligence from New York; and we can even participate in the pleasurable excitement produced in Washington by the news that the Confederates were recrossing the Potomac. Throughout the war there has been no achievement more creditable to the Confederate commander than this daring raid. Nothing which could be so deservedly recorded as a complete success. Upon the master-mind which conceived it, and upon the daring and disciplined soldiers who executed it, this new invasion of the Northern States reflects the highest credit, even if its results be summed up in the vague telegraphic announcements of 'enormous plunder,' and 'panic in Washington.' But regarded as an operation projected to permanently affect the issue of the present campaign, we believe that this movement is likely to influence most decisively the future of the war, and that the North is as yet but very far from comprehending its ultimate importance.

It was bruited about in Richmond a month ago that HUNTER would pay dearly for his temporary success in Western Virginia, and the threat has been fulfilled. HUNTER, indeed, escaped with the loss of half his artillery and all his trains, and with an army famished, dispirited, and demoralised. But the safety of his isolated corps has been extravagantly purchased by the blow which has been struck in Maryland and Pennsylvania. It is now pretty certain—and the fact shows how confident LEE is in his power to repel any force under GRANT's command—that the recent dash into Maryland was planned while GRANT was butting against the earthworks north of the Chickahominy. LEE's quick resolve has often been conspicuous during the war, but in no instance has he displayed greater promptitude, or higher generalship, than in this movement. General EARLY's column was put in motion within an hour or two after the announcement of HUNTER's victory at Staunton. But it marched not so much with a view to oppose the progress of HUNTER's army as to intercept its retreat. Some surprise was expressed, at the time of GRANT's last change of base, that no attempt was made by the Confederate general to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the fresh movement of his opponent. Now we know the reason why. GRANT was playing LEE's game in increasing the distance between his own lines and Washington. There was literally nothing to arrest the march of an army of 20,000 Confederates from the Chickahominy to the Potomac; and, accordingly, a force of about that number was quietly but rapidly transferred to the Shenandoah valley. HUNTER failed at Lynchburg, and retired, pursued by the Confederates; but the road to the Potomac was barred. There was nothing left to him but to retire across the mountains in Western Virginia, and leave the road to the North open to EARLY's column. Thus, whilst the Northern papers were loud in their exultation over HUNTER's safe retreat, and already anticipating a new advance, the Confederates, having made him safe, pushed swiftly on, took SIGEL by surprise at Martinsburg, captured Harper's Ferry, and were collecting stores in Maryland. So well kept was the secret, that SIGEL had no time to remove a wagon of HUNTER's train from Martinsburg, before the Confederates were upon him. Yet up to that moment it was believed in Washington that the whole of LEE's army was in the Petersburg lines. HUNTER being practically out of the fight, the Southern army pushed rapidly on by their old route; and, leaving SIGEL entrenched on Maryland heights, set to work to make Western Maryland and Pennsylvania pay their fair proportion of the war tribute. For a time the North affected to disregard the invasion. It was described as a mere cavalry raid, an incursion of guerillas. Nevertheless, the militia of the threatened States was immediately called out. What few veterans were still in the North were hastily assembled, and a small army, under General WALLACE, marched out of Baltimore to meet the invaders. The object was to defend the line of the Monocacy and the railway communication with Washington and Baltimore. But it was easily defeated. After a brief struggle, WALLACE's army was driven back in disorder upon Baltimore, with a loss of some 3,000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The confidence which had hitherto reigned degenerated into a disgraceful panic. It was suddenly discovered that the North was in danger. It was no longer a raid, but an invasion on a grand scale, under LEE's direction. The flames which lit Governor BRADFORD's house four miles from Baltimore gave colour to the belief, and one end of the movement was gained. GRANT's army was seriously weakened by the despatch of one or two whole corps to the relief of Washington.

As a raid, this movement has been, we repeat, an entire success. It has given horses and supplies to an army that needed both. It has placed the rich harvests of the Shenandoah at the disposal of the Confederate general. But it seems something more than a raid. From a military as well as a political point of view, it has accomplished great things. The North flattered itself that LEE was short of troops, that every man was needed to hold the defences of Petersburg against General GRANT. It boasted that GRANT, in his southward progress, had destroyed every railroad; and derided the idea of any Confederate force ever attempting to reach the Potomac. Yet, in the very height of the struggle, LEE could spare a small army to march 100 miles from Richmond, and to make a demonstration against the Northern capital. What is more, a Confederate army actually marched to within four miles of Baltimore and seven of Washington, while GRANT's 100,000 men were keeping their lines at least twenty-five miles from Richmond. We will put aside the rich booty of the raid, HUNTER's wagon trains, the stores of Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry, and of Frederick the capital of Maryland, though even these would have been well worth the cost of the expedition. But what, we ask, must be the moral effect of this blow? A Confederate army invades Northern soil, and defeats the Federals in a pitched battle within thirty-five miles of Baltimore. There is panic in Pennsylvania, but no enthusiasm. New York arms sullenly in self-defence, but declines to send troops to the defence of the capital. The men of Maryland do not conceal their sympathy with the invasion. Is it any wonder that the most sanguine of Federals should prove despondent, and that even the New York press should almost for the first time confess the humiliation of the Northern army? As a raid for supplies, the invasion is a success; as one of the most telling blows struck against the North, it is equally so. It remains to be seen now whether it will decisively influence the issue of the campaign. The latest intelligence inclines us to believe that it will have very serious consequences. If it be true that GRANT has been compelled to divide his forces, and despatch one or two corps to the relief of Washington, we shall in all probability very shortly see the abandonment of the siege of Petersburg. The 18th corps, under General SMITH, is spoken of as having arrived at Baltimore; two divisions of the 6th corps are mentioned as manning a portion of the defences of Washington; another corps from New Orleans, which would have gone to swell GRANT's present force, is also reported to have reached Maryland. It is possible that the opportunity has arrived which LEE has been so long seeking, when he may assume the offensive with numbers more nearly equal than they have been since the war began, and drive GRANT to his gunboats.

Under any circumstances, GRANT's position is very seriously affected. It is tolerably clear that the Confederates have effectively repaired the damage done to the Virginian railroads. Heavy trains are running from Staunton to Richmond laden with the spoils of the raid; and the direct road between Richmond and Washington, viâ Manassas Junction, is again in working order. If 30,000 men can hold Petersburg, LEE may be tempted to make another diversion of a still more formidable character; and under no circumstances can Washington and Baltimore again be left to the protection of a handful of inexperienced soldiers. At the latest date LEE was said to be feeling the left flank of the army before Petersburg with a view to an attack; and if GRANT has 'depleted' his forces to the extent acknowledged by the Federals, it will go very hard with the latter. We are evidently nearing the crisis of the campaign in Virginia. Another week's news may tell us of its conclusion.

New York and the Federal Government.

EVEN in the midst of the excitement and panic that have lately prevailed in the North on account of the military situation and the financial difficulties, considerable attention has been directed to the disputes in New York between the State and Federal authorities. It is indeed difficult for the Northerners to exaggerate the importance of this contest. If Mr. LINCOLN succeeds in asserting his claims, then there is an end of State jurisdiction, and the despotism which now virtually exists will be formally proclaimed. There seems a disposition on the part of Governor SEYMOUR to defend the laws of the State and the rights of the citizens. No doubt he is encouraged to make a bold stand by the impunity with which Mr. VALLANDIGHAM and other Western leaders have defied the edicts of the Federal Government, and also by the rapid growth of the party opposed to the reelection of Mr. LINCOLN. Whether Governor SEYMOUR is firm or succumbs to the threats of the Federal Government, it is an important crisis, and we therefore give our readers a résumé of the cases now pending between the State and Federal authorities. They are:—

1. The case of the people against ROBERT MURRAY, commonly called the ARGUELLES case, in which the defendant, who is United States Marshal for New York, is indicted by the Grand Jury for violating the statute of New York against kidnapping, in having arrested the Spaniard ARGUELLES and sent him out of the country on the order of the SECRETARY of STATE.

2. The case against Major-General DIX, the United States commanding officer of the Department of New York, of which the position is this. After the Grand Jury determined not to enquire into the case which had been laid before them, the District Attorney for the State, by direction of the Governor, took testimony and filed a complaint before Judge RUSSELL, of the City Court, upon which General DIX and all his subordinates who took part in the arrest of the editors of the Journal of Commerce and the World newspapers, and the seizing of their offices, were brought up for examination, with a view to their being committed for trial.

The proceedings in the ARGUELLES case are before the General Court of Sessions, of which Recorder HOFFMAN and Judge RUSSELL are judges. Those in relation to General DIX are before Judge RUSSELL in chambers, as committing magistrate. It will serve to prevent confusion to note that there is a separate Recorder's Court, of which HOFFMAN is the judge, and a separate City Court, of which RUSSELL is judge. They hold trial terms of the Court of Sessions alternately.

In both these cases, the order of the PRESIDENT of the United States is interposed in limine, as a bar to any proceeding whatever against his subordinates for the executing of any command which he issues to them in his official capacity.

The counsel for Marshal MURRAY came into Court, and moved for the transfer of the cause into the United States Circuit Court, under the Act passed by the late Congress, which provides that, during the present rebellion, 'any order of the PRESIDENT, or under his authority, shall be a valid defence in all Courts' to any action or prosecution, civil or criminal, for anything done by virtue of such order; and authorises the defendant in all such cases to transfer the suit or prosecution against him from any State Court into the Federal Courts.

The argument on this head was long and searching. There were some very strong points made against the application, of which the most cogent adopted by the Court were these:—

1. If the indictment were transferred to the United States Circuit Court, the verdict there must be final, for there is no right of appeal from the Circuit to the Supreme Court in criminal cases. The State is thereby precluded from testing the constitutionality of these proceedings in the highest Court, and robbed of her jurisdiction without remedy.

2. If a conviction be had in the Circuit Court, there is no power to pass judgment. United States judges cannot pass sentence upon offenders against the criminal laws of a State. The State cannot pass sentence on criminals convicted in other than its own Courts.

3. If the transfer is valid, and a conviction could legally follow, the extreme political consequence follows also, that, as power of pardon must lie, by that construction, with the PRESIDENT, he may discharge from all legal punishment the perpetrators of any act he may direct to be done in any part of the country, no matter how flagrantly in violation of State jurisdiction and personal liberty.

The Court detailed these consequences of the interpretation of the Act asked by the Government, to strengthen the position they took on certain expressions of the Act, that it was designed to refer only to civil suits, and not to interfere with State jurisdiction in criminal matters; and, therefore, that the case before them did not come within the provisions of the Act. They waived the point whether it is a constitutional exercise of power in regard to civil suits, but plainly intimated their opinion that it is not. They accordingly refused the application to remove the suit, and held that for the lawful uses of the Government the power which already exists of appealing to the Courts of the United States whenever questions of law arise in the progress of a trial before State Courts, where constitutional questions are properly raised, is ample.

The counsel for the Marshal then moved to quash the indictment, thus bringing up the question directly before the Court whether it would put on trial as a criminal the Marshal of the United States for executing the orders of the PRESIDENT. But, after argument, the counsel withdrew this motion, and agreed to enter a plea of not guilty, or otherwise plead to the indictment within a fortnight. The case goes over to the September term; but these questions will doubtless be raised there again on some special plea, fortified by the proof, which was not before the Grand Jury when the indictment was found, that the act complained of was done under the orders of the Federal Executive, and that the responsibility is assumed there directly.

The current of feeling is stronger in this case than in that against General DIX, because there is no plea of military advantage or necessity to be urged in its defence. The Federal Government has seized on a law passed for the single purpose of giving extraordinary help to the suppression of 'rebellion,' and used it to claim for itself an indefinite authority and arbitrary powers in matters that have no relation whatever to military operations or the conduct and progress of the war.

The DIX case is, however, to be the chosen field of conflict on these topics. A great array of counsel appears in it on both sides. Ex-Judge PIERREPONT and W. M. EVARTS are, with the United States District Attorney, for General DIX; and, on the other hand, the prosecuting officer of the State, A. OAKEY HALL, is assisted by the Attorney-General, JOHN COCHRANE, who was elected to that place on the Republican ticket last autumn, and is the candidate for Vice-President on the ticket of General FREMONT, nominated at Cleveland. This political conjunction is significant. There are also consulting friends on both sides among the chief politicians and lawyers of the State.

The plea is made directly for the accused that the suppression of the two papers, and all the attending acts of which they are accused, were done in pursuance of the written orders of the PRESIDENT of the United States, which written orders are offered in evidence; and the further plea is made that a general commanding a department in time of war cannot be arrested or put on trial by any civil authority whatever for obeying such an order.

At the first hearing on the 6th inst. the state of facts as recited, and the nature of the defence set up, were agreed to by the counsel on both sides; and on the 9th inst. the argument came on upon the first and preliminary point whether the accused can be held for trial at all by the State of New York, or whether, on the contrary, the mere fact of the existence of civil war vests in the PRESIDENT of the United States as Commander-in-Chief, the power of placing the military over the civil authority, at his own discretion, in all parts of the United States, as well within the jurisdiction of States undisturbed by the presence of any enemy and remote from the field of hostilities, as within the military lines; and, as a resulting enquiry, whether there is any constitutional authority in the Federal Government to invest him with these tremendous powers. The enquiry applied to the facts is, whether the PRESIDENT has, or may be authorised to assume, the right to order the suppression, by his military officers, of such public journals as may offend him, to imprison their conductors, and waste their property; and whether the PRESIDENT'S military authority shall stand as his officers' immunity against all responsibility elsewhere, setting aside all the most cherished maxims of civil liberty, and overriding the constitutions and statutes of States, and suppressing the right of the citizens of questioning the manner in which they are thus despoiled.

During the pleadings it was announced by the counsel for the Government that General DIX has received another order from the PRESIDENT, by which he is directed, while the civil war lasts, not to relieve himself of his command, or suffer himself to be deprived of his liberty for obeying any military command of the PRESIDENT.

This order is not a direction to General DIX to refuse to plead, or otherwise in this stage of the case to deny the authority of the State Courts to proceed against him. Neither does it preclude the interposition of that denial, if the Courts should insist on retaining jurisdiction. It is a minatory injunction that no process or judgment of the Court shall be permitted to interfere with the personal capacity of General DIX to execute any military duties the PRESIDENT may impose upon him. Governor SEYMOUR has understood it in this light, and has instructed the District Attorney to proceed with the assurance that the processes of the Court, whatever they may be, shall be enforced without distinction of persons.

The argument before Judge RUSSELL was concluded on the 9th inst. The decision of the Judge was reserved, and will be given on August 1.

There is no reason to doubt that the decision will be given against the plea for the Government, and that General DIX will be held to answer to the State laws for the trespass against the property of the two journals and the personal liberty of the proprietors.

An adverse decision may not provoke an immediate collision. The State authorities, satisfied with a legal vindication of their rights, may permit the judgment they obtain to remain for a while a dead letter; and the Federal authorities, in view of the Presidential election, will be anxious to avoid a contest which cannot fail to damage them. But, sooner or later, and probably more quickly than either party expects, the question must be finally settled. A distinct issue has been raised, and compromise is impossible. If Mr. LINCOLN submits to a check in New York, his despotic rule will be at an end; and, therefore, there is little doubt that he will, if necessary, endeavour to assert his assumed authority by force. On the other hand, the State authorities are aware that if they shrink from the conflict, it will be an open submission to the despotic pretensions of Mr. LINCOLN.

Our Volunteers.

SATURDAY last brought to a close the fourth of the great British rifle-meetings, which bid fair to wrest from the Epsom races the much-vaunted title of 'our Isthmian games.' The gloomy prophets who croaked over the first enthusiastic flow of the long pent-up stream of English warlike ardour—the sapient philosophers who turned up a contemptuous nose at the youthful folly of shouldering a rifle, and playing, as they called it, at soldiers—must view with feelings very near akin to disgust the animated contests of Wimbledon and the stately reviews of Hyde Park. To them belongs a feeling of surprise mingled with mortification; and even those who were disposed to take a more healthy view of our aspirations cannot but admit a certain amount of astonishment at the marvellous success of the 'volunteer movement' in this island. It must be confessed, true-spirited volunteers have had a hard game to play, a laborious task to perform. No one ever doubted the readiness of every Briton to fight for his hearth and home, or supposed that a threat of foreign invasion would have any effect but that of nerving every man's spirit to defiance; but it was an unprecedented thing that the sudden flush of anger should give place to a calm resolution, or even that a false alarm should give rise to a course of action which would forbid another panic to arise. Such, however, has been the line of conduct which the English people have pursued. We can all remember the panic of 1859—the sudden rush of the people to arms on the slightest insinuation of a threat of invasion—the perplexity of the Government, who knew not how to deal with this new Frankenstein, which had risen into life and might under their almost unwilling hands. The change which since that time has been operated in the spirit of the nation is worthy of the most minute observation, and may form a most instructive lesson to all future statesmen. The coming historian of England will be bound to observe how the conviction gradually arose in the mind of England that a movement of this nature, to be really useful, must not be a spasmodic effort nor a periodically-recurring fit; that it must be continuous and enduring if it is to command confidence at home and respect abroad. He will next observe how judiciously private enterprise and state protection have united in fostering the newly-found spirit, so that it has been possible to raise the standard of excellence, both in the masses and in the individuals, to a point far above that which was originally contemplated, not only with the acquiescence but with the hearty support of the people. Who in the early days of volunteering would have dared to require of the detached companies which were then formed the elaborate drilling, or expect them to support the intricate organisation into administrative battalions, or demand the painful and laborious rifle-practice, which now so extensively prevail? Yet, thanks to the English nature and the English common sense, these are the results to which we may now point, and which have raised our citizen troops to a position which every European army must respect.

The impediments which harassed the birth of our present volunteer system, and the quicksands which have beset its path, have been numerous; some have been avoided by the excellence of our Constitution, others have been beaten down and extinguished by the inherent vitality of the movement. Among the latter we would notice one, which has already left its mark upon our character, and which promises to affect our future actions in the most serious manner.

> Solaque quæ possit facere et servare beatum.'

Such was, occasionally at least, the creed of the Roman poet, and rightly so, perhaps; absence of enthusiasm, when contrasted with gross superstition, is possibly the less of two great evils. But that it is a great evil we most unhesitatingly affirm, and one which is, and has been for some time past, exercising a most baneful influence over the people of this country. The stoical, or rather lazy, indifference which has let party spirit die away in our Legislature, until some fond Utopians have fancied that it is really extinct; the utter listlessness and ennui of a society, no member of which is allowed to feel admiration, disgust, or emotion of any sort—these are the poisons which have been eating into the vitals of England, and struggled hard to destroy the volunteer system before it was well born. It came upon us, however, with a sudden rush, too violent to be withstood by a mere moral vice; and it swept away before it a mass of unhealthy and coxcombical pedantry, the offspring of the nil admirari spirit. Then, for the first time, men looked around with new eyes, and saw with astonishment that it was not an offence either against civilised customs or good breeding to be truly and heartily enthusiastic in a good cause. Our ideas have been raised concerning ourselves and our fellow-creatures; we look with pleasure upon the man who earnestly and successfully devotes his attention to the promotion of volunteering, and we feel an involuntary thrill of delight and sympathy. Do we not feel happier for this? Are we not inwardly gratified to find that our education has not utterly deadened every nerve in our hearts which can respond to a noble, or a devoted, or an earnest action in our fellowman? The immense benefit which the volunteer movement has done to this country by raising a protest against the vicious philosophy which we have referred to, can only be guessed at present by those who have had to deal largely with our highly educated volunteers, among whom the feeling was most prevalent. But the general merits of the movement in raising the tone of the English mind to a more noble pitch, and the ceaseless battle which is waged by our new-born principle of enthusiasm against the philosophy of indifferentism, will hereafter be worthy subjects for the most careful observation and investigation.

Another obstacle, which it was expected would stand in the way of a proper development of our volunteer system, was the light esteem in which volunteer troops have been held. It was said to be absurd to expect citizen soldiers to have the steadiness, the discipline, or the endurance of those who have been trained to the use of arms as their profession. And the à priori argument was supposed to be confirmed by the experience that we have had in this country of our militia, and in foreign countries of the national guard. The supporters of this idea must have been agreeably disappointed in the course of the last three years: and a very little consideration will show that they had not taken into account several elements which distinguish our English volunteers from other untried troops. Let us take a battalion of recruits of the line and a battalion of the London

Rifle Brigade: the former is a rude mass of wholly uneducated bumpkins, with about as much idea of organisation as a flock of sheep, and an ambition limited to the receipt of 1*s.* 1*d.* a day with the smallest possible amount of stoppages; the latter is composed of individuals nearly every one of whom is aware that union without method is only a synonym for chaos, every one of whom has been educated in the yard, in the workshop, or in the office, into an unconscious habit of organisation. Their ambition has an exalted object—one of the noblest, in fact, which can exert an influence on the collective mind of humanity—the assertion of the manhood of the country in the face of the general world. Whether of these twain will fall more readily into habits of steadiness and discipline, or acquiesce more heartily in the restraints required for the proper inculcation of them? It is evident that the educated battalion starts with an immense superiority over the other—an advantage which it will continue to hold so long as that other remains uneducated. This position, strange as it may have once appeared to military ears, is fully confirmed by history. They were educated volunteers, inspired with a lofty feeling of patriotism, who beat off the Persian mercenary hordes at Marathon; they were volunteers who asserted the independence of Switzerland against the trained feudal armies of Austria and of Burgundy; they were volunteers who first formed the United States of America; they were signally volunteers who, with an unequalled singleness and ferocity of purpose, asserted the independence of revolutionary France in 1794; they are volunteers who are now defending the existence of the Confederate States of America with heroism and conduct that commands the admiration of Europe. These are five examples only; if need were, many more could be brought forward, but none stronger than these, in which the volunteer and the mercenary system were weighed against one another, and the volunteer prevailed. It is evident to any one considering the question in this light that the instances of failure which our militia and the foreign national guards are supposed to present are not fairly applicable to the case. Neither of these institutions conforms exactly to the requirements of a real volunteer force, which are, first and chiefly, an exalted object, and, secondly, a leaven of education. The militia are only intermittent troops of the line; they are taken from the same class, look to the same object, and only receive a less systematic training. The national guard is an enforced service, and therefore any patriotism displayed in the performance of it is accidental and pardessus le marché; moreover, the duties of it are more those of police than of soldiers; we need not be surprised, then, if, when called upon to do military service, it has usually failed.

We must anticipate the objections of those who will say, 'If you believe so thoroughly in the superiority of a volunteer force, why not propose the abolition of our standing army?' There are many duties which must be performed for which it would be cruel and impolitic to make use of volunteer troops. It is necessary occasionally to take active measures of aggression either in retaliation or in chastisement; it is necessary to garrison our fortresses both at home and abroad; it is even requisite on some occasions (not such as we have lately seen) to give material aid to our independent colonies. To allow volunteers to perform these functions would be not only impolitic, but impossible; they would lose their distinctive value, and become professional soldiers, exactly similar to our present standing army. It cannot be too often repeated that the essential virtue of the volunteer system lies in the fact that it is the natural defensive force of the country, and any attempt to divert it from its proper functions to any other objects, however laudable, must end in confusion and disaster.

We have observed that there were difficulties attending the birth of the volunteer system, which nothing but the excellence of our Constitution could have avoided. Chief among these is the objection which has been always entertained against a great increase of armed force in this country. The English nation has generally been averse to a standing army. The descendants of the mighty barons of the Middle Ages, who had waged war with one another and with the royal power itself, in lordly impunity, might acquiesce in the loss of their own military privileges, but could not brook to see the dominant power of the sovereign over them strengthened beyond measure. STRAFFORD'S attempt to carry out the doctrine of 'Thorough,' in the time of CHARLES I., by means of a standing army, was received with equal disfavour by the higher and the lower classes. The attempts of the early sovereigns of the House of BRUNSWICK to increase their permanent forces were looked upon with great suspicion by the Tories; even at the beginning of this century the feeling was not wholly extinct. On the other hand, the objection which the executive power must feel to the formation of an independent force belonging wholly to the people is evident; we have seen it manifested lately in a most striking manner, by the refusal of the Italian Government to permit the enrolment of Garibaldian volunteers: it was, they said, the creation of imperium in imperio, and incompatible with the prerogative of the sovereign. It has been the proud lot of England to show how the mutual confidence of the sovereign and the people can permit the existence of a large, well-armed, and carefully trained force, which neither circumscribes the privileges of the QUEEN, nor endangers the constitutional liberties of her subjects. We may congratulate ourselves that, in the midst of the gloomy clouds of vacillation, infirmity, and selfishness which have overhung England during the last two years, there is this one ray of enduring brilliance which we can look upon with an honourable pride.

THIS book, which is amongst the first literary productions of Southern independence, is creditable to the scholarship of Southern gentlemen and to the enterprise of Southern publishers. It is not by the ordinary public, the consumers of cheap novels and the frequenters of circulating libraries, that a work like the 'Life of Du Guesclin' will be bought and read. It is reading for men of leisure with a taste for study, not for men who read only in the intervals of exciting sport or absorbing business. It belongs to that class of works whose frequency in any country indicates the presence of a cultivated aristocracy; of men whose studies are not confined to the beaten track of ordinary education, but who have time to go astray in quest of something more than ordinary education can possibly embrace, and whose pursuits are not too energetic and exhausting to leave their intellectual digestion strong enough for other food than would tempt a dainty appetite. Men who are hard-worked as professional and business men for the most part are find time only for necessary or for amusing reading—for histories like Froude's and Macaulay's, or novels like Bulwer's and Miss Mulock's; when we find such books as that before us, we know that there must be a class of readers with ample leisure and a cultivated taste. It is only for men of considerable previous culture that this book would have any charms; it is only men of leisure who could afford to spend their time in such an out-of-the-way corner of history.

The author has taken conscientious pains with his work, and whatever its faults may be, none of them are to be attributed to that wanton neglect which is nothing less than an impertinence to the public, and which it is the bounden duty of reviewers to note and to punish. The style is correct and careful, if not agreeable; the only remarkable barbarism being the introduction of the American 'loaned' for 'lent' into an account of a transaction between the King of France and Bertrand du Guesclin, an anachronism which produces a somewhat ludicrous effect. Generally the style has been much affected by that of the old chronicles from which the principal portion of Mr. Jamison's material is derived. It has their dryness, without that quaint simplicity which always serves to render them agreeable reading; and consequently the effect of the book is a little too much that which would be produced by a literal rendering into modern prose of the old ballads of chivalric romance or fairy tradition. Chapter after chapter merely reproduces, in a modern dress, the histories of Froissart and his contemporaries, many of which would not be read in the original, and for whose preservation in this manner we ought to be grateful; but they are merely embodied, without being assimilated, in the narrative, and the effect is one of frequent dulness and occasional incongruity. There has been a want of thorough digestion of the materials, a want of system and predetermined purpose in their use, and the consequence is, that though the biographer of Bertrand du Guesclin tells us all that is known of the hero and a great deal of his 'times,' he fails to give us either a connected and readable life of the man or an intelligible picture of the scenes and social conditions among which he lived, and moved, and played an important and active part. A writer of genius would have either reproduced the life and spirit of the old chronicles along with their facts, or he would have thoroughly worked up their materials into a homogeneous and continuous narrative in modern style. He would have treated them either as Arnold has treated the early legends of Rome, or as Grote has dealt with the first historical period of Greece. But Mr. Jamison, being merely a careful and diligent scholar, has done neither of these things, and his book, therefore, makes no appeal to that great majority of the public which expects the writer to do all intellectual work for his readers, and leave them nothing but to enjoy the finished product of his art. A man of genius would have introduced his readers to Bertrand du Guesclin in his habit as he lived, and to the age which made him what he was—would have made plain to us his place in history, the circumstances in which he found his country, and the position in which he left it—would have drawn for us a clear portrait of the man and a vivid picture of the age. Mr. Jamison does none of these things; he only gives us the means of doing them for ourselves. He has cut out of the history of France and Spain that portion which embraces the life and death of his hero; he tells us all that happened between Du Guesclin's introduction into active life and his death, as it might have been told by a contemporary and intimate associate of Du Guesclin, and from much the same standpoint. In fact, the work resembles rather that of a contemporary than that of a writer living four hundred years after the event. It has the minuteness of detail, and the want of perspective, of a picture drawn from the midst of a plain on a level with surrounding circumstances; it lacks that generality and breadth, that completeness as a whole, that proportion of features and subordination of details, which should distinguish the work of one who stands on the heights of subsequent experience, and views the scene from the distance of centuries.

Bertrand du Guesclin was the hero on the French side of that act of the long drama of war between France and England which embraces the reign of Edward III. The two countries had no lasting peace from the time of Henry II. to that of the Stuarts; but there was a difference in the character of the quarrel, at successive epochs, which ought not to be overlooked. The wars of the early Plantagenets and Valois were of feudalism, arising out of the relations of the Dukes of Normandy with the Kings of France, and affected only portions of the kingdom. The next wars were wars of succession, ending in a sort of partition. Edward III. and Henry V. each asserted a claim to the French throne, and each seized a considerable portion of the soil of France, which was lost in the minority of their successors. The one war exactly reproduces the other in its origin and results; and Bertrand du Guesclin plays in the first the part which in the second is filled, with loftier aims and under holier auspices, by Joan of Arc. After the reign of Henry VI., the wars of France and England were wars of policy, in which England, whatever she might nominally claim, ceased to aspire to the actual possession of any considerable territory on the other side the Channel.

Thus Du Guesclin appears to fill the part of a patriot and a loyalist, maintaining the cause of the legitimate king and the independence of France against an English claimant and English domination. And here and there his career affords indications that he did regard himself in that light. His original character, however, appears to have been that of a soldier of fortune; and it probably was rather by accident than by principle that he was enlisted on the French rather than on the English side. Once enlisted, however, he was true to his colours, and the merciless vengeance which he was prone to take for the very common crime of desertion was in some degree justified by his own irreproachable loyalty. In a different age, this straightforward, single-minded soldier might have earned a high place among those heroes who belong, not to their own generation or country, bnt to all time; for it is impossible to read his history without perceiving that while his virtues were distinctively his own, his worst qualities were those of a time in which the most horrible outrages were matters of everyday occurrence, and crimes which would have shocked the humanity of heathens had become too common to provoke serious animadversion in a Christian country. He shed blood lavishly and recklessly, yet he was less cruel than almost any of his contemporaries, whether French or English; and the most admired of his rivals and antagonists, whose name is quoted by historians as one of the brightest and purest ornaments of chivalry, however he might surpass Du Guesclin in the graces of a highbred and courteous knight, was more barbarous in his vengeance, more unscrupulous in his ambition, and by no means superior in any solid merit, moral or intellectual, to the rude Breton soldier. He who in the fourteenth century was guilty of fewer acts of cruelty and needless bloodshed than can be laid to the charge of the Black Prince, might in a more enlightened ago have borne an honourable comparison with the most humane and heroic of patriots and soldiers.

Bertrand du Guesclin was the son of a knight of no distinguished family or fortune; and, according to the metrical chronicler whom Mr. Jamison follows perhaps with too implicit confidence, was in early life neglected and disliked by both his parents, as a rude, uncouth, boorish lad, whose appearance and manners were a disgrace to his family. His time was spent chiefly in the rough sports of the lower orders, which in those days were deemed discreditable to a gentleman; but by such pursuits he gained a degree of bodily vigour and muscular activity, which, joined to the original hardihood of his constitution, rendered him in after life insensible to fatigue, and indifferent alike to danger and to actual injury. The quintain—tilting at wooden shields hung on a movable signpost—was among the unknightly sports of which he was accused, but it must have been no bad preparation for the joust; and accordingly, on the first occasion on which young Du Guesclin obtained horse and arms from a friend, and entered the lists unknown, he so distinguished himself as to extort from his father expressions of admiration which atoned for all past injustice. Not long afterwards, the young squire took part in the feud between Charles de Blois and John de Montfort, rival claimants to the Duchy of Brittany. He attached himself to the former, who claimed through the female line, and was supported by Philip, King of France. Edward III., himself preferring a claim to the French throne strictly analogous to that of De Blois, lent his aid to De Montfort. In the war waged in Brittany itself, Bertrand gained no slight distinction; and his services speedily obtained for him the honour of knighthood, and the government of a castle which he had taken by storm. He was afterwards attached to an embassy sent over to England, where he gave great offence to Edward III. by replying to the King's expressions of distrust that the Bretons would observe the treaty 'as Edward himself should observe it'—a reply characteristic of the blunt straightforwardness that ever distinguished him. The disasters of Crécy and Poictiers, in which Du Guesclin bore no part, neutralised all successes achieved in Brittany; the capture of King John and the weakness of the Dauphin paralysed the power of France; and for a considerable time anarchy complete and hopeless reigned throughout the country. It is not till after the suppression of the Jacquerie that we again hear of Bertrand du Guesclin—first as bearing a part in a private combat, then as marrying a lady who appears to have been in every respect worthy of the bravest knight in France, and finally as a leader of distinction in the war between France and Navarre. The victory of Cocherel in this war was the turning-point of the fortunes of France, and established the reputation and influence of Du Guesclin as one of the most capable military chieftains in the royal service. So high was his fame at this epoch, that, when captured at the battle of Auray, his ransom was rated at 100,000 francs—a sum which was paid by the contributions of his friends, Charles V. of France contributing 40,000.

The next service rendered by Du Guesclin was the removal of the Free Companies into Spain. These were vast gangs of banditti, led by knights of military experience and repute, who, after the battle of Poictiers, had spread themselves over France, plundering the towns, ravaging the open country, seizing and occupying strong places, and everywhere pillaging, ravishing, and murdering without restraint of pity or of fear. These avowed 'enemies of mankind' had already defeated an army sent against them, and there seemed no hope of ridding the country of them by force. But Du Guesclin's high reputation and the prospect of booty tempted them to take service under his banner in the cause of Henry of Trastamara, pretender to the crown of Castile. Then followed a war in that country, in which Henry was placed on the throne by Du Guesclin, and ousted by the Black Prince, who overthrew the Castilian army and took Du Guesclin prisoner. This time the captive himself fixed his ransom at 100,000 crowns, and was released on payment of this sum, though not till after so long a detention as brought upon his captor the charge of being afraid to let him go. Pedro the Cruel, the client of the Black Prince, so disgusted his patron by his ingratitude, that the latter returned to Bourdeaux, and, on the release of Du Guesclin, another invasion restored Henry to the throne of Castile. After this exploit, Du Guesclin returned to France at the King's request, and was speedily employed against the English, whose ascendency, owing to the discontent of the Gascons and the illness of the Black Prince, was seriously imperilled. Once more triumph awaited the son of Edward III., but the sack of Limoges did more harm than good to his cause. The horrible cruelty practised excited universal execration even in that ferocious age, and his success here, and the ravages committed by the troops of Sir Robert Knolles in the neighbourhood of the capital, so alarmed Charles V as to lead to the appointment of Bertrand du Guesclin to the office of Constable of France—the highest position in the gift of the Crown, and one not often bestowed on a man of humble birth and insignificant fortune. But the fame of Du Guesclin silenced all objections, and his successes speedily proved the wisdom of the selection of Charles V., who generally contrived to be well served. In 1370 the soldier of fortune received the Constable's bâton, and at that time nearly one-half of France was overrun by the English; their prestige was still unbroken, and the resources at his command were so limited that he was perforce restricted to that warfare of caution, delay, and annoyance which the King considered best calculated to defeat and baffle an enemy for whom the French were no match, as yet, in the open field. In ten years, without a single battle of the first magnitude, the dominions of the English had been reduced to a mere pied à terre at Calais and at Bourdeaux, and Richard II. inherited nothing of the vast possessions that his father and grandfather had won. This was the work of Du Guesclin's life, and he died almost before it was ended. He was besieging one of the last fortresses in the South of France that adhered to the English cause; he had borne an active part in repeated assaults delivered in the heat of July; and the exertions he had made proved fatal to his health, worn with a life of constant exposure and fatigue, and enfeebled by advancing age. He died in his sixty-first year, on July 13, 1380, on which day the castle surrendered.

We have said that the style of this history is somewhat dry, and that its materials, though well arranged, are not digested—that the author has rather reproduced and modernised the history given us by the old chroniclers than written one of his own by the aid of their information. But this said, we have said all that can be said in dispraise of a work whose merits we by no means desire to underrate. If it be not exactly light reading, it is not made otherwise by any affectation of style or substance; it is perfectly free from pretension of every kind, and the story of a great man, better appreciated in his own time than by posterity, is told as his contemporaries told it, with few comments and no embellishment. This is all Mr. Jamison pretends to do; he has done it under considerable disadvantage, and he has done it well, and his work is likely to restore to its deserved place in the temple of fame a name which has been deprived of honours freely bestowed on much less deserving claimants.

THE 'PIRATE' ALABAMA.

(From the Boston Courier.)

JOHN PAUL, calling himself Jones, commanded, during the third year of the war of the American Revolution, an armed ship named the Bonhomme Richard, which ship was never in any port of the United States, and was manned (though her chief officers under her captain were Americans) by foreigners, for the most part Irish, Scotch, Portuguese, Norwegians, and others, with only a few Americans, and all picked up in Europe. The chief business of the Bonhomme Richard was to capture and destroy English merchantmen navigating the British Channel and German Ocean. The Bonhomme Richard was at length destroyed herself, after a desperate engagement on the part of herself and her consorts against the British man-of-war Serapis, commanded by Captain Pearson. John Paul Jones held a Captain's commission from a certain rebel Congress sitting at Philadelphia, or Lancaster, or somewhere else in the British Province of Pennsylvania.

Query—Was the Bonhomme Richard a 'piratical craft?' Was she a 'privateer?' Was John Paul Jones a 'pirate?'

These enquiries are made under the impression of the deluge of 'piratical' phrases which the newspapers of the day pour out on occasion of the late naval engagement between the Kearsage, Captain Winslow, and the Alabama, Captain Semmes.

By the way, it seems that Captain Winslow of the Kearsage has paroled the crew of the Alabama. How is that? Is it customary to parole pirates?

One thing more in the same connection. We read occasionally in the Republican journals some very hard things about Benedict Arnold, the traitor. Are we to understand that a desperate rebel, who repents of his rebellion and returns to his allegiance, is a traitor? What of General Gantt of Arkansas?

In truth, all this calling of foul names which pervades the Republican press is one of the evil signs of the times. It is quite natural, however, that men who have outgrown the Constitution of the United States should have forgotten the American Revolution and all its lessons.

Thus, and thus only, can we account for the fact that Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Motley, whose fame as historians and as men rests upon their respective histories of rebellion, and heroisation of rebels as such, and especially of the great representative persons of rebellion, William of Orange and George Washington, should have settled down into opinions of legitimacy and of loyalty and of the divine right of Government, which would have delighted the hearts of Philip II. of Spain and George III. of England, as they now fit well the political atmosphere of St. Petersburg and Vienna.

THE WHEAT CROP IN VIRGINIA AND PENNSYLVANIA.—The Baltimore correspondent of the New York World, writing on July 8, observes: 'The wheat fields in all the counties in Virginia west of the Blue Ridge, and in the Cumberland Valley, which, in Pennsylvania, is the continuation of the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia, are of immense extent, and the crop of this year exceeded all expectation in the abundance and excellent quality of its yield. In Virginia the wheat harvest was for the most part over when this movement began. In Pennsylvania the wheat was just ready to be cut, and has been left standing in the fields by the frightened farmers, who have fled in terror across the Susquehanna River. The collection of this harvest and its transportation to Richmond, even by an army of thirty thousand men, will require much time. But it is now in full progress, and that it will be done successfully there is no reason to doubt. And if General Lee accomplishes by his northern movement nothing more than this, and the impressment of five thousand horses for his cavalry, the movement will pay him well.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

PARIS July 26.

But a few months ago the importance of the American war was more ignored by the French press than by the journals were aware of its extent or of its political and social significance; and not one, I may say, had anything like a just appreciation of the causes which had produced it, or of the principles involved in it. Certainly these principles are not yet all well understood, there are several sides to this American revolution, which future historians will call the most important of this century, which has not yet been even touched, or, worse still have been misunderstood and misrepresented. But, on the other hand, many of the fundamental questions raised by this revolution are now thoroughly well comprehended.

At the beginning of the war the French journals placed implicit confidence in the Northern newspapers. The falsehoods and the exaggerations of these journals were unknown to them; but little by little they learned to stand on their guard against the information which they supplied, the zeal of a few independent men who were friends of the truth and sympathisers with the South, finally succeeded in enlightening them thoroughly as to the value of the news which every steamer brought them. At the present time the French journals exercise a careful supervision over all information received. They are ready to consult the trustworthy correspondents of the English press, and decline to accept any statements coming from Yankee sources without large reservation. If, then, the majority of the French journalists have not yet embraced every point of view of the complex problem which is being worked out in America, many of the important elements of which it is composed are now at length well understood.

Thus the Federal character of the former United States, which the intelligence of Europe took so long to understand, has been explained in a very satisfactory manner by M. Dréolle, of the Patrie, in a controversy which was carried on by that journal about a month ago with the Opinion Nationale. In this controversy, out of which the Patrie came with flying colours, M. Dréolle not only proved to the Opinion Nationale that the several States of the Union were sovereign States, but also convicted the Yankee organ par excellence of having falsified the text of that American Constitution of which it spoke with such lofty decision. A success won from the Opinion Nationale by the Patrie on this subject is all the more remarkable that the former journal has taken upon itself to lecture the whole French press on American affairs. M. Malespine, the editor of the American part of the Opinion Nationale, has lived in the United States, and is fairly acquainted with the subject which he treats. For some reasons which are difficult to appreciate, he has become the warmest, and certainly the most skilful, champion of the cause of the North, when, according to his democratic convictions, he ought to be the defender of the South. Perhaps it is that he failed to understand the character of the war at its commencement and is now afraid to abandon his opinion, that he has allowed himself to be drawn into the path which he is now following, and is obliged to distort events and to mutilate news. This proceeding has for some little time been successful; strong in his acknowledged acquaintance with American affairs, he has been able to dress up facts at his leisure without fear of contradiction; now, thanks to the progress which French journalism has made in the study of American questions, he has lost his monopoly of knowledge in these matters, and he who put on the lofty airs of a professor has been forced in his turn to take his seat again on the school benches by those whom he used to treat as disciples.

Thus, the Pays during all the past week has been battering the Opinion Nationale without mercy, proving to it one day that it was in the habit of concealing things unfavourable to the North, another day that it had mistranslated the Confederate manifesto, and constraining it by repeated attacks to confess publicly the errors of which it had been guilty.

The Pays defends the Confederate cause with zeal and skill. The chief editor of that journal, M. Grenier, is a man of philosophic mind, who understands the importance of the problems which the American war must resolve. It is the only journal which has dared with regard to the question of slavery to say in print that if we ought not to have any diplomatic relations with the Confederate States because they are slaveholders, we ought equally to withhold them from Spain, from Turkey, from Russia, and from the United States themselves, who are also slaveholders. As for the absurd calumny that slavery is the cause of secession, the Pays exposes it with great vigour. It says: 'None so deaf as he who will not hear. The advocates of the North belong to the latter category, and they recall to our minds in every way the old proverb, "surdus, absurdus." They repeat—against all evidence they repeat, and will continue to repeat, the trivial calumny, that the Confederates are fighting for the maintenance of slavery. If the Confederates had wanted merely to maintain slavery, they had only to extend their hands to the North and submit. In 1861 a manifesto of Mr. Lincoln's offered to maintain slavery. In 1862 another manifesto of Mr. Lincoln's still offered to maintain slavery as a condition and a pledge of peace.'

The news of the invasion of Maryland by the Confederates has been received with ill-humour by the Yankee journals, who pretend to treat it with ridicule. The Patrie of the 24th instant, in an article by M. Aucaigne, which contains some very lucid explanations of the geographical and strategic features of this invasion, replies with great felicity to the precipitate judgment passed upon the movements of the Confederates by the Journal des Débats, before our latest intelligence had given us better information on the subject, which attributed them to the impulse of despair. The Temps declares that if the North could not succeed in putting a stop to the Confederate incursion, we must despair of her cause, which had only excited so great an interest in Europe because men counted on the unshaken energy of the North, and on the strength of those great and noble principles which it represented and is commissioned by Providence to uphold. The noble principles which the Yankees represent, forsooth! The readers of the Temps of to-day will learn—1st. That the panic felt by the Federals in the invaded districts was fomented by the Copperheads. 2nd. That the battle won over General Wallace was only an insignificant affair. 3rd. That the attitude of the people of the North has been that of a people devoted to a great cause. 4th. That the object of the Confederate expedition was to make a raid on an immense scale. And 5th. That the Government has had no sort of fears with regard to this invasion. This splendid piece of historical information is followed by the expression of a hope that the next mail will bring to the friends of the North the news of the capture of Petersburg and Atlanta. I do not think that the editor of the Temps who enjoys so well established and honorable a reputation, can be privy to the scandalous system of distorting the truth [illegible]. The Patrie of this evening contains an article by M. Vermorel, "Banques and War Loans." The last number of the Monitor Financier also contained an article upon the finances of the North. The Pays reports that there has been a conference between Lord Russell and Mr. Adams on the subject of the pretensions of the North to the extradition from England of the crew of the Alabama saved by the Deerhound. Mr. Lincoln says the Pays, who considers it a duty to deliver up to justice the Poles who are serving under the French banner, ought to be quite natural that England should open up to us as a matter of war, the ship-wrecked men who have been saved by an English ship from imminent death. [illegible] to be claimed by any civilised State or by any honorable Government.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER July 27, 1864.

THE Executive Committee of the Southern Independence Association have published another [illegible] and the precedents and members of general [illegible]. The last similar publication took place at the opening of the present session of Parliament, and it may therefore be of some interest to note the progress, as well as influence, as to [illegible] which the Institution has received within that comparatively brief period.

Having been called into existence, primarily, to put a stop to the reign of political fraud and almost [illegible] with which the city was threatened by the [illegible] auspices of a small but noisy knot of Federal agitators and, in the second place, to educate the popular mind in these countries in the knowledge of the true bearings of the American war, it was scarcely to be avoided that the Association should at first be of almost as local a character with regard to its promoters and members, as with regard to the field of its immediate operations. But if, in some respects, this condition appeared in the first instance a drawback, it was not without some compensating advantages. It was only right and proper that where error and falsehood had been propagated, there also they should be refuted. It redounded, too, to the political credit of Manchester, that local gentlemen of high mercantile reputation should find in the establishment of the Southern Association an occasion and a spur for them to step out of their privacy and lend their influence in giving weight to the public protest against this city being quietly lectured by such war-Christians as Mr. Beecher and Mr. Noel. The doors of the Free-Trade Hall nerved shutting against the repetition of such an exhibition as a Manchester mayor shaking hands on a 'Bible platform' with President Davis's 'so-called' negro coachman; and it was good that a Manchester institution should close the building accordingly. But while such are some of the advantages of its local origin and activity, the Association made haste to extend itself far and wide throughout the whole of the manufacturing districts. By multiplying the scenes of its labours and enlisting the best sympathies of large masses of people everywhere in the cause it sought to promote, the Society began to attract considerable attention, until its operations have now come to be regarded with marked favour in every county in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. A glance at the members' roll (the publication of which will probably occupy, one of these days, the larger half of a page of the Times) would be sufficient to convince the bitterest enemy of the South that, by how much he wishes ill to the Confederacy, by so much he differs from people in whose company as representing all ranks, professions, callings, and shades of religious and political belief—he might think it tolerably safe to err.

Aside, however, from considerations of this kind, my object in calling attention to the subject was to show the remarkably rapid progress the Association had made during the past six months, and to note the gratifying appreciation its labours had met with from persons of influence and distinction, who continue to swell the members' roll in great numbers.

The Institution is still fortunate in its noble President, the Right Honourable Lord Wharncliffe, to whose cordial co-operation it was chiefly due that the Society partakes of its present practical and influential character. Leading the list of vice-presidents are the Most Noble the Marquis of Bath, the Most Noble the Marquis of Lothian, the Right Hon. Lord Claud Hamilton, the Right Hon. Viscount Litford, the Right Hon. Lord Teynham, Viscount Gormanston, Lord Robert Cecil, Lord Henry F. Thynne, &c., &c. Among the members of the general council may be recognised the names of a large number of baronets and others of the landed gentry of the highest consideration in their respective counties. Among members of Parliament also on the list are the names of Judge Haliburton, W. H. Gregory, Esq., R. Bremridge, Esq., J. Hardy, Esq., J. T. Hopwood, Esq., W. S. Lindsay, Esq., Matthew Henry Marsh, Esq., J. A. Roebuck, Esq., W. Schofield, Esq., W. Vansittart, Esq., &c. The army and navy are represented by General Sir J. W. Guise, Bart, G.C.B.; Admiral the Right Hon. Lord Fitzhardinge, G.C.B., P.C.; Vice-Admiral Hon. Sir J. Keppel; Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Coutts Lindsay, Bart.; Colonel the Right Hon. G. C. W. Forester; Major the Hon. W. E. Cochrane; Major the Hon. S. P. Vereker, &c. The list of deputy lieutenants and county magistrates is also of a most influential character, as is that of members of the learned professions, and of representatives of the trade and commerce of the United Kingdom.

Thus powerfully constituted, and acting under the direction of an Executive Committee composed of gentlemen of the highest position in Manchester, the Southern Independence Association has been found fully competent to get through the work it set itself to do. Its object being rather to enlighten than to agitate the minds of the masses, a great portion of its labours has consisted in the compilation and distribution of plain and well-reasoned papers upon American affairs, and therefore much of its work is to be judged by results rather than by the usual noisy evidences and accompaniments of a political agitation in course of progress. These papers have been quietly circulated in thousands and tens of thousands; and if the aggregate action of all the kindred and branch associations is taken into account, the total issue during the past six months may be reckoned at hundreds of thousands. Nor did it take long for the seed thus carefully sown to grow and bear fruit. Requisitions were poured in to mayors of electoral towns and to influential proprietors in non-electoral townships, calling upon those persons to invite the people to assemble in public meetings, and consider what steps might properly be taken to make known the opinions of the majority as to the course Her Majesty's Government ought to adopt. The prevailing feeling exhibited at these meetings was amply testified by the many 'Southern' petitions, memorials, and resolutions that have been forwarded from time to time, now to the Prime Minister, now to the Foreign Secretary, now to both Houses of Parliament, and, in some instances, I believe, to Her Majesty herself. The temperate spirit in which for the most part the meetings were conducted, and, above all, the remarkable acquaintance the people possessed with the chief points and the true meaning of the civil war in America, bore witness to their own thoughtful good sense, and excited the admiration of all who took part in the proceedings. The hon. member for Bolton (Mr. T. Barnes) paid, perhaps unconsciously, the highest compliment to the Southern Independence Association, when at a public meeting of his constituents, he said he was almost afraid to touch upon the American question, for the people of Lancashire were so thoroughly 'up' in it, that even a member of Parliament might be caught tripping in a discussion of the subject in their hearing. As with Bolton, so with every other borough, township, and village throughout the whole of the manufacturing districts in the North.

But the crowning triumph of the Association, so far as 'results' go, was witnessed in London during the last fortnight, in the extraordinary number of petitions poured into the House of Commons, and in the even more significant deputation of factory operatives to the Foreign Minister. Such demonstrations as these it is impossible to misinterpret, nor ought they to be lightly dismissed as unimportant signs of the times.

A NORTHERN VIEW OF NORTHERN FINANCES.

WE transfer to our columns the following editorial from the New York Commercial Advertiser, upon the finances and the prospects for the New Secretary of the Treasury:—

The resignation of Mr. Chase has been followed by the general assent of the community. There seems to have been in no quarter any desire expressed to have him remain in office, and yet it is not to be disguised that a few months since his administration of the finances was very popular. The causes of the great change in public sentiment are easily recognised and readily comprehended. The same causes uniformly produce the same effects, and Mr. Chase is no exception to the common fate that has overtaken those who attempt to administer the finances of a nation during a crisis.

The fiscal year ended June 30, and it may be assumed that Mr. Chase has directed affairs through three entire fiscal years. The results are, then, as follows, as officially reported:—

	Customs	Taxes	Miscellaneous	Total receipts	Total expenses
	$	$	$	$	$
1862 .	49,056,397	1,795,332	1,083,991	51,935,720	474,744,778
1863 .	69,059,642	39,125,892	3,214,233	111,399,766	714,709,995
1864 .	103,213,193	109,000,000	36,421,752	247,858,184	880,000,000
Total .	221,329,232	149,921,224	40,719,976	411,193,670	2,069,454,773

The receipts, it appears, were drawn more than half from the customs by simply raising the rate of taxes, an operation which was highly gratifying to those manufacturing interests that have so long and so pertinaciously contended for Government protection, and which they have found extended to them in a manner altogether unhoped for previous to the war. That was a mode of taxation which met with very little opposition. That large section of the country which formerly was in bitter opposition to it was now in rebellion, and the friends of protection became the firm supporters of Mr. Chase. That gentleman opposed taxation in any other shape. The $20,000,000 tax upon property that was passed in July, 1861, never went into operation, and Mr. Chase uniformly replied to the most sagacious and far-seeing financiers that 'the people would not submit to taxation.' His theory seemed to be that the patriotism of the people would not suffice to sustain the war if it was accompanied by onerous burdens, but that if by paper-money issues a factitious and short-lived prosperity were created, the war would be popularised, and perhaps brought to an end before the collapse of the paper. This affords the only key to a system so monstrous as that disclosed in the above figures, which show that of the whole amount of money actually raised in three years, $221,000,000 was from customs, largely benefiting the interests of manufacturers, $41,000,000, about, from land and commutations of conscripts, and but $150,000,000 from taxes. This was all to meet an expenditure of, in round numbers, $2,100,000,000. The expenditure for the last year does not include sixty days' pay due the army July 1. The annual expenses, loans and debt, were as follows:—

	Expenses	Loans	Paper Money	Debt
	$	$	$	$
1862 . . .	474,744,778	154,887,418	269,331,954	424,211,772
1863 . . .	714,709,995	183,545,577	401,036,482	1,584,581,600
1864 . . .	880,000,000	451,401,367	243,053,863	694,455,230
Total . . .	2,069,454,773	789,836,162	913,412,299	1,703,248,314

The loans embrace all that portion on which special interest is paid. All the rest is floating paper, and has the effect of currency, since it is at the command of the owner and constitutes a purchasing power. Thus in the first year there were no new taxes. Of the war expenses, five-eighths were raised by paper money and three-eighths by loans. The effect of the paper money was to produce a rise in prices, speculation, and a semblance of great prosperity, during which no taxes were levied. Goods of all kinds, old stocks and new, brought high prices and sold readily, diffusing general satisfaction, and enabling the Secretary to contract loans, because the Federal bonds depreciated as compared with merchandise.

This depreciation became latterly so rapid as to create alarm, and the Secretary attempted violently to depress prices in April last—in other words, to unmake the prosperity that he had before stimulated into life. He had promised that 'war could not last until midsummer of 1864.' That time is now reached, and the war is still going on, without much sign of coming to an end, and without the revenues that he promised should be available at this time. In the midst of this disaffection, he inaugurates a decline of prices, a depreciation of values, a drying up of individual revenues, a stopping of production, loss of wages, diminution of the national wealth, simultaneous with heavier taxes. It is not surprising, therefore, that his popularity should wane. The radical mistake that he made is now very apparent. Had he not distrusted the patriotism of the people, but had boldly, in the first year of the war, levied $300,000,000 of taxes, partly on real estate, and the remainder by a tax on sales of commodities, one hundred millions of loan would have sufficed. The people would readily have paid these taxes. Prices would not have risen, and less than half the money actually expended in the second year of the war would have been necessary. The war could then have been continued ten years at least, before the present debt would have been reached.

The inflation has now reached its utmost tension, and the taxes imposed in the midst of a collapse will not be productive. This is a very unpromising state of affairs for the new Secretary to face.

A DOUBLE QUOTATION.—'It is well,' says the Boston Courier, 'to bring forward the similar sentiments of men holding influential positions, expressed under other circumstances. Mr. Davis was certainly prophetic. Mr. Lincoln reminds us of Hazael the Syrian, asking—"Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" and went home and murdered his master. The following is an extract from the Inaugural Address of Abraham Lincoln, March 4, 1861:—"Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you. This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it." The following is an extract from a speech of Jefferson Davis in the United States Senate, January 10, 1861:—"If you will not have it thus; if in the pride of power, if in contempt of reason and reliance upon force, you say we shall not go, but shall remain as subjects to you, then, gentlemen of the North, a war is to be inaugurated, the like of which men have not seen. Sufficiently numerous on both sides, in close contact with only imaginary lines of division, and with many means of approach, each sustained by productive sections, the people of which will give freely both of money and of store, the conflicts must be multiplied indefinitely; and masses of men, sacrificed to the demon of civil war, will furnish hecatombs such as the recent war in Italy did not offer. At the end of all this, what will you have effected? Destruction upon both sides; subjugation upon neither; a treaty of peace leaving both torn and bleeding; the wail of the widow and the cry of the orphan substituted for those peaceful notes of domestic happiness that now prevail throughout the land; and then you will agree that each is to pursue his separate course as best he may. This is to be the end of war. Through a long series of years you may waste your strength, distress your people, and get at last to the position which you might have had at first, had justice and reason, instead of selfishness and passion, folly and crime, dictated your course."'

THE FOURTH OF JULY.—Consider it an unfortunate thing that the Fourth of July does not occur in December. The thermometer ought to indicate the freezing point when a man reads the Declaration of Independence to a Northern audience at such a time as this. He must be a cool man naturally, and ought to have a refrigerator for a nostrum, who has the face to go through that document before a public assembly, from the clause which asserts that 'all governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed,' down to the final article in the long list of royal outrages—'he has excited domestic insurrection among us.' There is not a wrong alleged nor a grievance enumerated in that instrument which Lincoln has not perpetrated and surpassed. To denounce a defunct King of England for which an American President is eulogised for performing, is an enterprise which no ordinary mortal would undertake in this weather. These are the circumstances which must add to the difficulty of such a performance—such, for example, as the fact that 'the day they celebrate' dawned from the sky of that Virginia which they are now seeking to rend and devour; that it was Richard Henry Lee, delegate from Virginia, who, by instructions from his constituents, rose in that dreadful hour and moved the resolution of Independence; that it was Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, who drafted the declaration whose anniversary they celebrate; that it was George Washington, of Virginia, whose mighty chieftainship made that declaration good. To add new glories to the Fourth of July by crushing Virginia for ever to the dust, is a conception which could enter none but the brains of a 'peculiar people.'—Richmond Despatch, July 2.

LUXURIANT CROPS IN VIRGINIA.—The Baltimore correspondent of the New York World writes under date of July 4: 'The whole of Virginia south of the James River and east of the Blue Ridge, and, indeed, for some distance north of the James River, may be truthfully described as a vast kitchen garden; for it is, this summer, literally overflowing with all sorts of abundance. In spite of what has been called the sweeping conscription at the South—in spite of the efforts that have been made to steal and to lure away the negroes this stubborn fact remains; the farms are there; the negroes and their masters are there, and the crops are there. The same may be said of the country through which the Danville Railroad runs, for a great distance on each side of its track, even down into North Carolina. The counties of Prince Edward, Notaway, Charlotte, Lunenberg, Halifax, Mecklenburg, Pittsylvania, and Henry, in Virginia, and the whole of the northern tier of counties in North Carolina, as described to me by a gentleman who recently passed through them, have been as complete strangers to the incidents of war as the State of New York. The fields are ploughed and sown as usual, and the abundant harvests, "some fifty and some an hundred fold," are gathered into barns and granaries, much the same as in the good old times when the Democratic party and Democratic principles bore sway. In all the counties that I have named, the crops of this year, of all kinds, are abundant, as well of fruits and vegetables as of grain. And all this plenty is being poured into the lap of Richmond day after day.'

THE GREAT SOUTHERN CENTIPEDE.—'The Tribune says: "The rebellion is visibly on its last legs, and tottering at that." It now becomes an interesting question, how many legs has the rebellion got? Years ago we were told it was on its "last legs," and still there appear to be a few more left. Can any entomologist inform us?' (Journal of Commerce.) Though not much of an entomologist, we venture to suggest that the rebellion, in extremities, resembles the lobster more than the centipede, inasmuch as when it loses its 'last legs' new ones grow.—New York Paper.

THE RICHMOND MARKETS.—The Richmond Examiner of June 30 has the following:—'The markets, notwithstanding the siege of Richmond, as announced by Grant, have been better supplied and easier the present week than for several months past. The substantials of life and the fruits of the season are cheaper, too, and people begin to wonder whether Grant had not better keep up his invisible siege, if these are the good results to flow from it.'

CAN THE WAR GO ON?—We quote the following from the Morning Post of to-day:—'On Monday night Mr. Lindsay enquired if it was the intention of the Government, in concert with the other Powers of Europe, to use their endeavours to bring about a suspension of hostilities in America, and Lord Palmerston replied that in the present state of things it was not thought there would be any advantage in such a step. This incident forces us to ask how long it is really probable that this impracticable, aimless, hopeless war will last. Is it at all likely that it will survive the present campaign? It cannot seriously be supposed that the Northerners will go on fighting for ever at the cost of national bankruptcy and universal ruin and the desolation of their homes, not only without any tangible profit or advantage at present, but even without any prospect of possible benefit in the future. We speak of the desolation of Northern homes, because as the loss in killed and wounded is at least thrice as great on their side as on that of the Confederates, there must soon be not a single family in the Federal States but what will have to mourn the death of one or more of its members, or to witness the sad spectacle of a husband, a brother, a son, painfully dragging himself about a cripple for life. Is it creditable, is it conceivable, is it even possible that the Federals should continue such a war much longer? Their doing so really seems to be inconsistent with the nature of man and of things. Man is not given to ruin himself systematically for nothing. War cannot be carried on upon national bankruptcy. The mountains of debt which the Federals are piling up, like Pelion upon Ossa, must ere long fall with a tremendous crash, and bury the Government under their ruins. From the number of regiments which are continually marching home on the expiry of their term of service, and leaving the armies in the very crisis of a battle, it is evident enough that those who have had one taste of the war will not enter the ranks a second time. Those who have not served may by the bribe of high bounties, by kidnapping, by enlisting them when drunk, and other notable American devices, be induced to go forth as food for powder. But at this rate all the male population having gone through the ordeal either as 'hundred days' men,' or for a longer term, there will be no inexperienced civilians left to bring within the net of the conscription. This leads to an important conclusion. Even the civilians themselves, who have had no taste of the realities of war, and have been accustomed to view it on its bright and romantic side, have resisted the draft by force in more than one locality. What, then, will be the effect when it is attempted to press trained soldiers who are thoroughly sick of campaigning? There will be another civil war in the North. It has been lightly said that immigrants from the Old World will fill the Northern armies, but this will not bear serious examination. If the North is to depend upon mere foreign mercenaries, the war will come to an end very speedily indeed; and if it could be carried on by such means, it would be far more formidable to the Government at Washington than to that at Richmond. But, at all events, mercenaries or patriots, foreigners or natives, there must be money to pay the troops; there must be money to satisfy the contractors, whose war this has now really become. That a financial collapse is imminent does not admit of the shadow of a doubt. No soldiers, American born or aliens, will fight, no soldiers can fight, without money for the necessaries of war. No contractor will supply these necessaries without money. When the crash comes, and come it must, and at no distant period, soldiers and contractors, American enthusiasts and foreign mercenaries, will leave the war to take care of itself.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE directors of the Bank of England at a special meeting on Monday raised the minimum rate of discount from 6 to 7 per cent. It was fully anticipated that such a course would be adopted during the week, in order to put a stop to the large withdrawal which had for some time been taking place with a view to supplying foreign establishments. To a certain extent this appears to have been effected; but still the heavy demand for accommodation which has since sprung up, chiefly in consequence of the rise in the value of money, tends to the belief that a further advance will be deemed necessary, and it is not at all improbable that it may take place to-morrow. Out of doors the applications for discount have been so numerous, that the brokers will not transact business under $7\frac{1}{4}$ to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and in some instances as much as 8 per cent. is demanded. Of course, under these circumstances, money is not so very abundant, and the Joint Stock Banks are not making advances under 7 and $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. On the Stock Exchange some loans have also been in more request, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 8 per cent. have been the ruling quotations; but to-day the demand has not been so pressing, and the terms now are $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 7 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The movements in bullion and specie still continue of an advanced character. All the available gold that has arrived has been purchased for transmission abroad, and nothing whatever has been sent into the bank; at the same time the withdrawals have not been so large as of late, amounting only to 40,000*l*. The arrivals have also been small, 97,830*l*., of which 56,542*l*. is from New York and the remainder from Australia. The Syria, which sailed to-day for the East, has taken out 118,280*l*., of which 22,000*l*. is in gold and 96,280*l*. in silver. The silver market remains very quiet, the demand for shipment being very limited, and for bar there is no alteration in quotations. Mexican dollars are not quite so firm, a portion of the supply brought by the last packet having been sold at 5*s*. 4*d*. The gold ships at present advised as on their way from Australia are the True Briton with 102,000*l*. and the Wellesley with 95,000*l*.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market at one period showed some symptoms of improvement, but the rise in the value of money caused a complete revulsion in all the markets, and prices have since been steadily declining. The dealers, under the circumstances, refrain from pushing business, being also apprehensive that a further advance in the Bank rate will have to be resorted to at a very early period. Political affairs abroad are also continuing to exercise an adverse influence, and it does not seem probable that anything like confidence will be established till the result of the present Conference on the Danish question has been arrived at. As compared with last week, Consols exhibit a decline of $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent., the closing quotation this evening being $89\frac{7}{8}$ to 90 ex div. for money, and $90\frac{1}{8}$ to $90\frac{1}{4}$ ex div. for the account. Exchequer bills have also become weaker, the March issue being down to 9*s*. to 4*s*. dis., and those of June to 6*s*. to 1*s*. dis. The Foreign Stock Market also participates in the downward movement, but the decline comparatively has not been so great as in the English securities. Greek and Mexican show a fall of $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent.; Spanish Passives and Turkish about $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; but the Spanish Certificates have only declined $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. The latest quotations were—Greek, $23\frac{1}{4}$ to 24; Mexican, $28\frac{5}{8}$ to $28\frac{7}{8}$; Spanish Passives, $28\frac{1}{8}$ to $28\frac{3}{8}$, and the Certificates, $9\frac{7}{8}$ to $10\frac{1}{8}$; Turkish Six per Cents. (1854), $90\frac{1}{2}$ to $91\frac{1}{2}$, and those of 1862, $69\frac{1}{2}$ to 70 ex div.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The tightness of the money market has affected the value of this security in common with other stocks. The closing price to-day is 75 to 77, with a steady market.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The transactions in American Government and Railway Securities continue extremely limited, the successive unfavourable accounts with regard to the progress of the Federal armies rendering the brokers more indisposed than ever to operate in this class of securities. The only dealings recorded during the week have been in Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvanian section, at 73; ditto, ditto, second mortgage, at 69 and 68. Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at $44\frac{1}{4}$, $44\frac{1}{2}$, 44, and 45 dis.; and ditto, ditto, $100 shares, all paid, at 51, $51\frac{1}{2}$, $51\frac{3}{4}$, and $51\frac{1}{4}$.

NEW YORK AND THE MANCHESTER TRADE.—The principal of a New York firm of the highest standing writes as follows by the latest advices to his representative in Manchester:—'The excitement during the past fortnight in all kinds of produce is unprecedented. The enormous fluctuations in the currency have created a great speculative feeling, and influenced the markets to such an extent that the execution of orders has become impossible, except at a very great risk, which purchasers on commission are not willing to incur. On the 1st inst., gold went up to 285, and declined the same day (when the Gold Bill was repealed) to 225. It has since fluctuated as much as 10 and 20 per cent. in a day, and at the present moment is quoted at 275. As long as this state of things lasts, we must be content to look on, and wait till affairs show a surer foundation to work upon. You will perhaps not be entirely unprepared to hear of this last invasion of the North, details of which go out by this mail.'

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for the English railway securities was rather animated early in the week, and prices exhibited a rising tendency; but in sympathy with the other departments, there has since been much heaviness, and quotations have receded all round, the decline varying from $\frac{3}{4}$ to 3 per cent. To-day the market has not shown any improvement, and closes without much animation. The variations since this day week have been a decline of 3 per cent. in London, Chatham, and Dover, and Vale of Neath; of 2 per cent. in Great Northern A shares, London and Blackwall, and North Staffordshire; of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Western, West Midland (Oxford), Metropolitan, North Eastern (Leeds), and ditto (York); of 1 per cent. in Caledonian, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North Western, Birmingham and Derby, North Eastern (Berwick), Shropshire Union and South Yorkshire; and of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in Midland and South Eastern. In Foreign and Colonial railway shares there is but little animation, and prices are declining.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, ETC.

At the half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Alliance Bank, the report, which was adopted, stated that the net profits for the half-year ending June 30, amounted to 62,397*l*.; which, with 6,933*l*. available from the previous half-year, made a net balance of 60,330*l.*, being upwards of 22 per cent. on the capital for the time it has been paid up. This balance the directors proposed to appropriate as follows:—viz. 31,250*l.* in payment of a dividend of 10 per cent. per annum on the paid-up capital; 1,500*l.* in reduction of preliminary expenses and building account; 30,000*l.* to the reserve fund, thereby raising that fund to 84,000*l.*; and 6,580*l.* to the profit and loss account of the present half-year. The directors recommend the immediate increase of the capital of the company to 4,000,000*l.*, by the issue of 10,000 additional shares.—At the meeting of the Union Bank of Ireland, Mr. Bruce in the chair, the report of the directors stated that the available profit for the half-year was 9,558*l.*, including a previous balance of 4,126*l.* Of this sum it was proposed to appropriate 5,000*l.* towards a dividend of 10*s.* per share, or at the rate of rather more than 4$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum; 1,500*l.* to be placed to the reserve fund; 1,000*l.* to preliminary expenses, which would leave a balance of 2,058*l.* to be carried to the current account. The report was agreed to.—At the meeting of the Midland Banking Co., Mr. H. Hankey in the chair, the report presented, and which was adopted, stated that the gross profits for the half-year, including 1,710*l.* brought forward from the previous account, were 11,704*l.*, and that, after deducting interest paid to customers, &c., rebate of interest on bills discounted and not yet due, there remained a balance of 3,543*l.*, out of which the Directors recommended that 370*l.* be written off preliminary expenses, being at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum—that 1,459*l.* be appropriated to the payment of a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax—that 1,000*l.* be placed to the credit of the reserve fund—and that 715*l.* be carried forward to profit and loss new account.—At the half-yearly meeting of the London Joint-Stock Bank the report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the net profit for the past half-year had been 124,476*l.*, out of which the directors proposed the usual dividend at the rate of 12$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, with a bonus of 1*l.* per share, leaving a balance of 26,976*l.* to be carried to profit and loss new account.—At the fourth annual meeting of the Imperial Bank, the report presented showed that, after payment of the whole of the current, making allowance for bad and doubtful debts, &c., the profit and loss account exhibited a balance of 63,437*l.* including 48,288*l.*, the premium received on new shares, which the directors recommended should be appropriated as follows:—To dividends at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum free of income-tax, from the six months ending June 30 on paid up-capital of 12,000 shares, 1st issue, 9,600*l.*; to payment at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on paid-up capital of 10,500 shares of 2nd and 3rd issue in lieu of dividend, 849*l.* to reserve fund, premium on new shares 48,288*l.*: to balance to be carried forward to credit of profit and loss, new account, 4,700*l*—The Merchant Banking Company, at their half-yearly meeting, declared an interim dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum free of income-tax for the past six months. The past operations of the Company are said to have been very successful, and the future prospects are most encouraging.—At the first ordinary meeting of the Bank of Otago, the balance sheet exhibited the operations of the Company in London from the time of its formation to June 30, and in New Zealand from December 7 to March 31, a period of little more than three months. The Government of Southland have arranged to transfer its accounts to this Bank, and to entrust it with the disposal of a loan of 110,000*l.* on the Government debentures. A branch was opened at Invercargill, on February 2, from which the colonial manager expected satisfactory results.—At the meeting of the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank, a dividend was declared at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and added 8,000*l.* to the reserve fund.—The Australian Mining Company at the annual meeting have declared a dividend of 1*s.* per share.—The Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company have also declared a dividend of 1*s.* per share.—At a meeting of the Land Securities Company, the report showed that the net profits to June 30, were 902*l.*, besides profits on advances, which were estimated at 4,985*l.*—The New Zealand Trust and Loan Company have declared a dividend of 2*s.* per share, free of income-tax, being at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.—The directors of the Contract Corporation have declared a dividend at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum.—At the meeting of the London and South Western Bank, the report stated that the available balance for the half-year was 6,079*l.*, including a previous amount of 1,910*l.*; and a dividend was declared at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, which will absorb 3,000*l.*, 537*l.* was written off preliminary expenses, and 2,542*l.* remained to be carried to the current half-year's account. At the same time 14,000*l.* derived from premiums on new and on unallotted shares, was placed to the reserve fund.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the Industrial Company of Central Italy. The capital proposed to be raised is 250,000*l.* in 25,000 shares, of 10*l.* each. The first object of the Company is to purchase and work some extensive deposits of native sulphur in the Romagna, near the productive mines of the Bolognese Company, which for many years have realised as much as 33 per cent. per annum. Only about half the capital it is expected will be required. The vendors have consented to receive half the purchase-money in shares which are not to participate in the interest or dividend till the other shareholders shall have received 10 per cent. -The Metropolitan Ice Company is announced with a capital of 50,000*l.* in 10,000 shares, of 5*l.* each, and 6 per cent. interest is to be allowed until the first dividend meeting. Property for the erection of suitable premises, on the Grand Surrey Canal, Deptford, has been secured upon a fifty years' lease. A concession has also been obtained from the Canal Company, giving the directors the exclusive rights of collecting ice from the Black Horse Bridge to and including the Surrey Docks.—The Locomotive Cotton Press Company has also been announced. The required capital is 100,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each, but the first issue will be 5,000 shares only. The object is to purchase the patent rights for pressing cotton and other articles by locomotive machinery, and to carry on operations in the East Indian cotton districts. As the railway authorities insist upon the cotton being pressed up country, the emissaries of the Company will proceed to the stations on the lines near the districts where the staple is grown, and thus greatly facilitate its conveyance to the port of shipment by the ordinary trains.—The Merchant Banking Company have issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for the British and Netherlands India Bank. The capital to be raised is 2,000,000*l.*, in 40,000 shares of 50*l.* each, but in the first instance 20,000 shares only will be subscribed. It appears that, notwithstanding the increased security of banking facilities in the East, business in India, China, Japan, and Australia has greatly outrun existing banking accommodation, and there appears to exist a necessity for further banking facilities in those parts. It is contemplated in the first instance to commence business in the Madras Presidency, China, Japan, and Batavia.—A prospectus has also been issued of the Rinchintong Tea Company, with a capital of 60,000*l.*, half to be first subscribed in shares of 10*l.* each. The object of the undertaking is the cultivation of three freehold estates in the district of Darjeeling. The land comprises 2,000 acres, 206 of which are already cleared and planted with the best varieties, and the purchase money is to be 20,000*l.*, of which one-quarter or one-half, as may be desired, will be taken in shares.—This evening four additional prospectuses have been issued, viz. that of the Norwegian Charcoal Iron Company, with a capital of 150,000*l.* in 7,500 shares of 20*l.* each. Deposits 1*l.* per share on application, and 3*l.* on allotment. The object is the purchase of and working the Eidsfoss Iron Works at Kongsberg, in Norway, which have been obtained on very advantageous terms.—The National Boiler Insurance Company ask for a capital of 100,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each. Deposits 1*l.* per share on application, and 1*l.* on allotment. The object of the undertaking is to provide against the risks of loss, both of property and life, from the explosion of steam boilers—risks which are at present confined to one or two local companies. The Guildhall Taverns Company propose raising a capital of 100,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each; deposit on application 1*l.* per share, and on allotment 2*l.*, with the view of purchasing, carrying on, and extending the businesses of the Guildhall Coffee House and the Castle Tavern, at the corner of Gresham Street and King Street, in the immediate vicinity of the Guildhall and the Courts of Law. The Directors have already purchased the leases, stocks in trade, goodwill, furniture, plate, wines, &c., of both establishments, on very advantageous terms. A minimum dividend of 10 per cent. per annum will be guaranteed for three years. The Washoe United Consolidated Gold and Silver Mining Company are asking for a capital of 100,000*l.* in 20,000 shares of 5*l.* each; deposit on application 10*s.* per share, and a further 10*s.* on allotment. The object is the working and development of a property situated amongst the richest and most extensive in the Nevada territory, and which has hitherto been held by private individuals.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The quiet previously noticed in the produce markets has been increased by the enhanced value of money, and purchases are entered upon with greater reserve in every department. There have been somewhat numerous arrivals of produce during the last day or two, and they have also tended to check enquiry, as dealers are led to delay the execution of orders in the expectation, not only of a better choice of goods, but also some advantage in terms, when the fresh supplies become available. Meanwhile stocks in first hands are for the moment small, and as the markets are but scantily furnished, prices are tolerably well maintained; its good feature generally is the steadiness with which the deliveries progress. The provision markets, affected by the prospects of better supplies, as well as by dearer money, have been depressed, foreign butters declining 4*s.* per cwt. The demand that prevailed for the better qualities of bacon has subsided, and sales are difficult, except at 1*s.* and 2*s.* per cwt. decline. American provisions are at the moment neglected, the New York advices having unsettled quotations. Hops of all imports are firm, strengthened in some measure by the unfavourable crop reports from America and Belgium. The corn trade has shown renewed dulness, and sales of wheat to any extent could not be effected except at lower prices. Sales, however, are not pressed, and quotations, therefore, remain without material change. Linseed and rape seed tend to higher rates. Linseed cakes, owing to the recent protracted drought, are dearer, American barrels 10*l.* to 10*l.* 5*s.*; bags, 9*l.* 5*s.* to 9*l.* 15*s.* Petroleum is steady in value at 2*s.* 2$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 2*s.* 3*d.* per gallon for American refined on the spot, and 2*s.* 4*d.* for the last four months' delivery; but the demand during the last day or two has been dull. Linseed oil has declined to 38*s.* 3*d.* on the spot, the make having been increased by the enhanced price of cake. Seal oil maintains its value firmly, at 46*s.* to 46*s.* 6*d.* for pale, and 43*s.* to 43*s.* 6*d.* for brown, the market deriving support from the upward tendency in the price of seed. Tallow during the last few days has been more in demand at an advance of 3*d.* to 6*d.* per cwt. Dye goods of all kinds are firm, and the common qualities of saffron rather dearer. A moderate business is passing in indigo at fully the last sale's rates. The wool sales have been in progress since Thursday last, and have manifested a good home-trade demand, prices ruling fully up to those of the previous series for all but scoured Port Phillip and greasy wools, which are slightly easier. The sugar market continues extremely dull, and rates are again 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt. lower. Coffee is not offered largely for sale, but is barely so firm as it was a week ago. The only changes in spices are a slight advance in cassia lignea, first pile selling 92*s.* to 94*s.*, and an advance of 4*d.* to 5*d.* compared with the rates current last quarter in the price of cinnamon. The metal trade is much less active. Scotch pig iron has receded to 57*s.* 9*d.*, and spelter to 24*l.* 15*s.* Straits, however, remains at 106*l.* cash, and 108*l.* with full prompt.

Liverpool, Wednesday, July 27.—After the excitement of the last two or three weeks, our cotton market has once more assumed a quieter appearance, and there is a very slight tendency to a relaxation in prices; but, stocks having become exceedingly small, holders seem disinclined to make the reduction demanded, particularly for American and all long stapled descriptions. The sales this week have been 41,000 bales, of which 10,500 have been on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,629,230 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 1,184,720 bales. There have been imported this year 1,207,943 bales, against 1,067,741 bales last year. Taken by the trade this year, 1,001,202 bales; same in 1863, 654,470 bales. The exports this year have been 312,419 bales; to the same period last year they were 261,340 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 288,640 bales, against 262,970 in 1863. At the present time the estimated stocks are 184,720 bales, and at the corresponding period last year they were 262,637 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were, American descriptions, 28$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 31$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Pernambuco, 28$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 30$\frac{3}{4}$d.; Maceio, 29$\frac{1}{4}$d. to 30*d.*; Bahia, 29$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 30$\frac{1}{4}$d.; Egyptian, 29*d.* to 32$\frac{3}{4}$d.; Surat, 15$\frac{1}{4}$d. to 26$\frac{3}{4}$d.; and Peruvian, 28$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 32*d.*

Business in the Manchester markets was pretty firm and moderately active in the early part of the week, but the subsequent advance in the rate of discount, and the rather unfavourable tendency of the telegraphic advices from India and China, have had a depressing effect, and rendered business exceedingly quiet. There has been scarcely anything doing in shipping yarns; there are some buyers in the market, but their operations have been very limited. More business would have been transacted but spinners hold out for extreme prices, being heavily under contract, and they do not show the slightest disposition to press sales. Very little business has been transacted in home-trade yarns, and there is little variation in prices, but where any change has taken place it has been rather in favour of buyers, but the variation is quite fractional. The cloth market within the last day or two has also become extremely dull; buyers show no disposition to make advantageous offers, and manufacturers stand out for former rates. In fact, business is now said to be so limited, that it is difficult to test the variation in values. The Indian news is to the effect that the markets were quiet there, and without any material alteration in prices. The final quotations were $\frac{7}{8}$ grey printers from 8*s.* 9*d.* to 16*s.* 9*d.*, according to quality; $\frac{9}{8}$ grey madapollams from 7*s.* 10$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 10*s.* 4$\frac{1}{2}$d.; $\frac{9}{8}$ grey printers from 12*s.* 1$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 18*s.* 6*d.*; $\frac{5}{4}$ grey shirtings from 13*s.* 3*d.* to 27*s.* 6*d.*; water twist, No. 20, from 1*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 10$\frac{1}{2}$d.; No. 30 from 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; No. 40 from 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; mule twist, No. 20, from 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 40 from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.*; No. 60 from 3*s.* 0*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; No. 80 from 3*s.* 4*d.* to 3*s.* 11*d.*; and No. 100 from 3*s.* 9*d.* to 4*s.* 7*d.*

Now and Then.—When the war commenced it was to end in thirty days. In fourteen months it had so far progressed that a powerful army lay near Richmond in order to seize the Confederate capital, but was driven back. In two years and two months the North was invaded by the army of General Lee. In three years and three months the grand army of the Potomac is just where it was at the close of the first fourteen months, and with less prospect of taking Richmond now than it had then. In the meantime, over two millions and a half of men have been called into the field to do that which seventy-five thousand were expected to do in thirty days. A debt has been entailed on the country in three years counting by thousands of millions; the land is filled with lamentation and woe over the sons and fathers slain; the country filled with those shorn of limbs in this worse than useless war. All who wish to stop the further effusion of blood are denounced as enemies of the country. For over three years madness has ruled the hour; three months of sanity, with a cessation of hostilities, would result in peace.—New York Daily News, July 12.

An application has been made to the Dean of Westminster, and granted by him, for leave to erect a monument to Mr. Thackeray in Westminster Abbey.

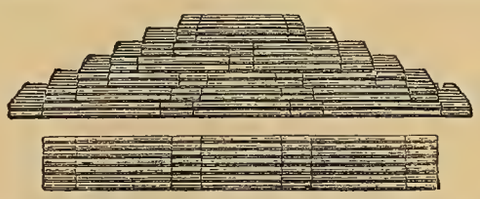
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

HUBBUCK'S PATENT WHITE ZINC PAINT.

THE most durable and beautiful paint known, is cheaper than White Lead, and is proved to be superior for all purposes than the pernicious Lead Paint, and equally adapted for all climates. Its whiteness is unaffected by bilge water, boiling sugar, or noxious gases. It is free from any poisonous ingredient, and suited in all respects to the use of the painter. Each Cask of Pure White Zinc is Stamped 'HUBBUCK, LONDON PATENT.' Inferior Zinc Paint, so marked, having been sold in Foreign Markets, the Patentees offer a Reward of FIFTY POUNDS for information which will lead to the conviction, in an English or Colonial Court, of those who have pirated their Mark. Both Exporters and Retailers are liable for its sale.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—CONSTITUTIONAL TROUBLES AND PARTISAN USE OF THEM.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

NEW YORK: July 19, 1864.

SIR,—At the recent session of Congress a law was passed prescribing a rule for counting the votes to be cast at the election for President in November, which, in some not improbable contingencies, may have very disturbing consequences.

By this law every one of the States heretofore proclaimed by the President to be in insurrection is declared to be incapable of casting any vote for elections of President and Vice-President, or of electing senators or representatives in Congress, until it shall have returned to 'obedience' to the Federal Government, in manner and form to be determined by an Act of Congress to be 'hereafter' passed, and the return is duly promulgated by proclamation of the President. Congress adjourned, and no such enabling act was passed into a law.

A Reconstruction Act passed both Houses prescribing the forms by which subjugated or repentant States, when there should be any, could make new constitutions of the Congressional pattern, and be readmitted into fellowship with the 'loyal' North. But, through the obstinacy of the South, subjects for this process are lacking, and no claimants could possibly be looked for until after the Presidential election is over. The plan of Congress, if it had been permitted to become law, would have annulled the proceedings instituted by Mr. Lincoln, by which Louisiana and Arkansas have been 'reconstructed,' and were represented in the Baltimore Nominating Convention as States. Mr. Lincoln, therefore, did not sign the Bill as it passed, assigning, with an audacious frankness which in better times would have been resented as insolent dictation, his unwillingness to consent to the reversal of his own acts, as among his chief reasons for defeating the legislation of Congress. The rule established by the Act of exclusion, which he did sign, shuts out these States also, unless, as it is sometimes hinted that they may, they contend that they were restored States before the law passed, whom Congress has no power to eject, and proceed to hold elections, and the result of the elections elsewhere should make it the interest of any party to maintain their right to have their votes counted. The President, in suppressing that Bill, is accused of having meant to keep open that chance for helping himself to votes in case of need.

By the terms of the new law the eleven States which were proclaimed by the President to be in insurrection are declared to be incapable of casting a vote in November. The execution of the law makes such changes in the actual numbers and proportions of the electoral votes, and may lead to such disagreements and contentions, that it will be useful to furnish your readers with a statement of the numerical relations the States bear towards each other in the Presidential vote, and how they are affected by this rule.

The number of electoral votes to which each State is entitled constitutionally is compounded of the number of its members in the House of Representatives and the number of its senators, of which each State has the fixed number of two. The number of representatives is determined by its population, as defined in the Federal Constitution, and is ascertained by census taken every ten years. After every census a new apportionment is made. Formerly tedious legislative time was necessary to fix on a certain number as a ratio, part representation, and the aggregate number which should only a full house was consequently undetermined and fluctuating. The practice has now been adopted of fixing in advance a number of which the House shall consist, and a rule for the representation of fractions, devolving on the Department of the Interior the ministerial duty of distributing them when the census should be completed. The number of the present House was fixed, under the census of 1860, to be 233; but supplemental legislation increased it to 241, by the allowance of eight more representatives to various States upon whom the strict rule inflicted hardship. These computations were for the undivided Union. The whole number of States was then 34. The whole number of representatives was 241; the whole number of senators was 68; and consequently the whole number of electoral votes was 309, and the majority necessary to effect an election by the colleges was 155. On a failure of the election by a popular vote, the number of States necessary to effect an election by States in the House of Representatives was 18.

The figures in detail are as follows. I separate the adhering States from the eleven States since proclaimed and now excluded, after they had taken themselves off and elected a President for themselves in another Confederation.

ADHERING STATES.

California	5	Michigan	8
Connecticut	6	Minnesota	4
Delaware	3	New Hampshire	5

Total electoral votes by census of 1860 . . 309

In 1861, the eleven States enumerated in the last of the above tables withdrew from the Union, taking with them 61 members of the House of Representatives and 22 Senators, representing 83 votes in the electoral colleges. A subsequent proclamation of the President declared them to be in insurrection, and the Act of Congress just passed excludes them from the count in the choice of the next President. I do not imagine this vote troubles those who have gone out, but it is of some interest to those who remain. It is a legislative enaction that the Federal Congress consists of 180 members of the House of Representatives and 46 senators from 23 States, and that there shall be at the Presidential election in November only 226 electoral votes. It results that 114 votes in the electoral colleges (instead of 145), or 12 States in the House of Representatives (instead of 18), may choose a President.

It is true that Congress, and the Northern Government and people generally, have held that acts of secession are void, that no State can take itself out of the Union, and that the absence of their members in either House made only vacancies in representation. Nevertheless they have received, and continue to recognise, members of both Houses from the seceded States. Andrew Johnson, one of the senators in Congress from the State of Tennessee, refused to go with his State when they seceded, but remained, and was recognised, and acted as senator, after she was proclaimed to be in rebellion. A minority of the population of Virginia got up a legislature, which appointed two senators to Washington; and though Virginia is proclaimed to be in rebellion, these senators sat, and continue to sit, in the Federal Congress. A majority in a portion of Western Virginia adhered to the North, was excepted from the proclamation, and erected itself, in open violation of the Constitution, into a separate State, and was received by Congress; that portion has also two senators in Congress. Insurrectionary Virginia has, therefore, four senators at Washington. The new Act of Congress decrees, that the proclaimed part shall not vote; and if it comes to be a material point in the elections whether the loyalised fraction, which counts as the 35th State in fact, and the 24th in the roll of voting States, shall be permitted to vote, the question will be bitterly contested by the losing parties. The whole Opposition, and to-day many more than the Opposition, contend that there is, constitutionally, no such State as Western Virginia. Judge Catron, one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding a circuit court in one of the States of his circuit, has lately held that he could not judicially recognise any State within the limits of Virginia other than that which covers the whole of the territory. Both in the present and the preceding Congress members have been received from portions of the seceded States—at one time two from Louisiana, and two or three from Tennessee, and three from Virginia—to nearly the last hour before this exclusion rule was passed. Now and hereafter, under the strict operation of the rule, the number of States would be, as I have said, 23; of senators, 46; representatives, 180; and electoral votes, 226. The party in power construe it so as to make, with West Virginia, 24 States, 48 senators, 183 representatives, and 231 electoral votes. This theory of the Union makes the whole number of States 35.

It must be observed that as Virginia, an 'insurrectionary' State, is fully represented in the Southern Congress, and has double sets of senators received in the Federal Congress, so Missouri and Kentucky, which never formally, by undisputed State action, separated themselves from the North, and therefore form two of the twenty-three adhering States, are also fully represented in the Confederate Congress. The action within those two States in favour of the Southern Confederacy has the additional character of being a protest against a domestic State Government maintaining itself against the popular will by the exterior force of the Federal Government. There are conflicting State organisations respectively acknowledged as legal by opposing Governments. Hence, though the number of States be but 34, the North with the two Virginias has 26 represented in the Senate, and 23 in the electoral colleges, and the South counts 13 in each.

It is not difficult to understand in how many ways a Presidential election, conducted on this novel rule, may in these tumultuous times be productive of violent contentions.

There is one very grave question connected with it, which is put out of sight by all parties who agree that the war must be prosecuted; but will be revived, and put prominently forward, whenever the peace party obtains a hearing above the din of arms. It will ask, and no sufficient answer will be given, upon what principle of law or of justice, in a constitutional Union of States, two-thirds of them may make a special rule among themselves by force of which they exercise exclusively the functions of a common Government, exactly as though the remaining States were never to be reckoned as members of the Government until subjugated by force of arms, and taken in anew, on submission to new terms, as foreign and alien States might be, and at the same time unrelenting war be waged against them as rebels to the altered Government from which they are peremptorily excluded by its own act.

Foreign governments which look into the organisation of governments de facto, claiming a title to recognition as independent, will find the plea for the recognition of the South vastly strengthened by this Northern proceeding. To impartial understanding it is the public admission that the eleven seceded States are independent of the authority of Congress, and beyond the jurisdiction within which the Constitution of the United States can act; that practically each of the States exercises the power of self-government, and their common government is so established as to be supreme over that of the United States within its territory. The position of the United States, therefore, is towards them the same as that of Spain towards her South American colonies, which had become States by the exercise of all the powers of internal self-government when England proposed to recognise their independence, and was haughtily told by the Spanish monarch that he would never surrender his right of dominion over his revolted subjects, nor relinquish his purpose to subdue them by arms. You have within your reach, while I have not at hand, the text of the reply which Mr. Canning, then Foreign Secretary, gave to this Spanish despatch. I remember the substance distinctly, and its appositeness to the present attitude of England towards the Southern Confederacy. Mr. Canning, with all the courteous phrases of diplomatic language, accepted this declaration as a discharge for Great Britain from all obligation to consider Spanish wishes thereafter in respect to her treatment of the South American question. He said that the position of Spain being that of asserting an absolute right for all time, without the chances of reconsideration in changing circumstances, or respect for rights acquired, or that might be acquired, by time and possession, and without consideration for the interests of the world in the commerce of vast territories which were shut up by this unreasoning will of Spain, there was nothing left upon which the two Governments could deliberate together, and no motive for any further waiting by Great Britain in expectation of concert at any future time with Spain. He thereupon gave notice to the Spanish King that Great Britain would thenceforth act exclusively on her own views, without reference to his, of the rights acquired by the American States, and of her own interests and the general interests of nations, in acknowledging their independence. An English Minister of this day, like George Canning, or such as Lord Palmerston was before fatally trammelled by the party necessity of taming himself down to the Russell standard, might find a stronger case for a parallel document in the assertion by the North of a will as stubborn, unreasoning, and irrational, accompanied as it now is by the legislative record of a confession of defeat. He might with undeniable good faith assume the South to be independent when he finds the Northern States modifying the proportions of power among themselves in the organic matter of renewing the executive power on the basis of a separation accomplished pro tanto.

Some of the changes silently effected by this legislative act, work radical changes in the adjustments of power prescribed in the Constitution. Take the New England States for an example. In a constitutional union of 34 States the six States of New England are entitled to—12 out of 68, the whole number of senators, or 17·65 per cent.

27 out of 241, the whole number of representatives, or 11·20 per cent.

39 out of 309, the whole number of electoral votes, or 12·62 per cent.

But in the new organisation by 23 States, New England has—

12 out of 46 senators, or 26 per cent. of the Senate.

27 out of 180 representatives, or 15 per cent. of the House.

39 out of 226 votes, or 17·25 of the electoral colleges.

The relative voting power of New England in the making of a President is greater by nearly five votes in a hundred than it would be under the distributions of the Constitution. Its rightful proportion is little less than one-eighth of the whole number. In the next election it will have one-sixth. There is ample ground upon which to excite against New England the passions of the great masses who are already filled with resentment against the author of the calamities which affect the country, and who will not conceal that she should make profit by her sons, and will make this legalised expunging of the Southern vote the occasion for demanding new adjustments, which, if they do not lessen the power of New England, that has been so potent for mischief, will at least restore the equilibrium among the adhering States, which the Constitution makes. A great many other combinations of the figures may be made to show that the balance of power among the States no longer exists under this rule as the Constitution placed it. There may be ground for contending, under the literal terms of the Constitution, that an election for President may be valid, if made by a majority of electors 'appointed,' even if a considerable number of States should fail to appoint. The language of the Constitution is that, on the counting of the votes legally cast in the electoral colleges, 'the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number appointed.' But it is contended that this clause did not contemplate the case of a systematic abstention of one-third of the States from casting their votes, and the exclusion of their voting by the deliberate action of the other two-thirds. It is no accidental irregularity, but a permanent dislocation of the system; and, when this operates to keep in power an odious administration and to aggrandise a domineering section, forms of language will not be strictly construed against the plain intent of the Constitution and against the popular understanding of rights made keener by a popular sense of wrong. There is much food for discontent in the chances that ruinous measures and hateful men may be fastened on the country, by the straining of the powers of Congress, to re-distribute among twenty-three States the powers which were adjusted and distributed for thirty-four. To the plea that there are no forms provided by which there can be an election in any other way, the answer is brief and emphatic: the South, then, is dismembered, in fact, and it is time to have a new settlement—to meet the new position. And when this issue is made, amidst the trials which the coming election is sure to engender, a political crisis will have arisen which will test what may remain of the power of coherence among these States.

If there be room for dispute about the Constitutional majority required in the electoral colleges, there is none whatever in respect to the majority required to effect an election by States in the House of Representatives. If there be no election by a majority of electors 'appointed' and the case do not arise then, to be disputed whether 114 votes will elect, the House of Representatives must proceed to elect as follows, under the 12th Amendment of the Constitution:—

'If no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest number of votes, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the vote shall be taken by States, the representative from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.'

A quorum of 'two-thirds of the States' means two-thirds of the States of the Union, which means, unless the eleven seceding States are constitutionally out of the Union, a quorum of two-thirds of thirty-four, which is twenty-four. If the disputed State of West Virginia be counted, twenty-four would still be the number required. If a less number be received as a quorum, it must be because the number of the States is constitutionally less than thirty-four, and that the separation of the South is constitutionally effected and conceded.

It will be seen that without the State of West Virginia, of which the Constitutional existence is vehemently denied by a large party, no quorum can be made in the House. Without her there are but twenty-three States represented in the House, and without twenty-four it cannot act. These two questions, the right of less than a quorum of all the States to act, and of the right of West Virginia to make the quorum by voting at all, will meet the House of Representatives at the threshold of an election, and be contested with unyielding pertinacity by the opposition. They will never consent that an election shall be held on these terms, nor submit to an adverse result thus obtained.

Should this deadlock as to the quorum be overcome by the hasty admission of some one of those Northern territories which Congress authorised to make constitutions and become States without further action on its part, the contest will be continued on the point that no man can be constitutionally chosen President without having a majority of the votes of 'all the States,' that is, without receiving the votes of eighteen out of thirty-four, or thirty-five States, as the case may be. If less than a majority of 'all the States' be permitted to make the President, the election will be denounced as a fraud, and fierce revolutionary strife will break out.

The plain fact is, that the whole of the political system of the United States is disjointed, and if we say the coming Presidential contest is likely to make it fall violently asunder, we only recognise the power of centrifugal forces which, since the conservative influence of the South has been drawn off, has made its fall ultimately certain, and to which the fury of war passions, the resentment of political disappointments, and the shame of national humiliation, are giving fearful acceleration.

I remain, respectfully yours,

An Observer.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

Whether Atlanta has been occupied by the Federals is doubtful, despite the positive assurances of Mr. Lincoln's organs. At first it was reported that the Confederates had evacuated Atlanta, and that the enemy had gained a bloodless triumph. Next it was stated that a severe battle had been fought, that the Federals had lost 1,500 men, the Confederates 4,000 prisoners, and had retreated to Macon. Upon this news the price of gold in New York declined, and was quoted at 251. Next day (July 23) there was no official confirmation of the fall of Atlanta, and gold was quoted at 254¾. That is, on the evening of the 23rd the people in New York rather doubted the report which they had credited on the morning of the 22nd. The next mail will tell us whether the scepticism of New York was or was not justified.

It is said that in the reported battle before Atlanta, fought on July 21, the Confederates were under the command of General Hood, and that General Hood has superseded General Johnston.

In Virginia there have been no movements of importance. Grant, having sent a large part of his forces to Washington and Baltimore, has had to contract his lines and to repose under the protection of his gunboats. The Petersburg Express of July 12 says: 'We have positive assurance that Grant has greatly contracted his lines. After repeated efforts to extend his left flank around to Reams's Station, he has now withdrawn it to the east of the plank road and several miles nearer to City Point.' The Philadelphia Age says that, in consequence of an urgent order from Washington, Grant had to despatch a part of his forces for the defence of the capital, and that this made the contraction of the Federal lines necessary. 'The various troops on the southern wing were moved northward to fill the gaps caused by the departing regiments. The southern flank was drawn in nearly a mile. The hills near the Weldon Railroad were abandoned, and at once occupied by the Confederates. Strong bodies of the enemy were moved down from Petersburg, and works were thrown up on the hills. The railroad was repaired, and trains began running. . . . Grant now has but four corps.' Grant's position appears to be strictly analogous to that occupied by M'Clellan after the seven days' battle. Like M'Clellan, Grant is forced to be inactive whilst his army is being depleted by sickness; and at the same time he reports, just as M'Clellan did, that he is preparing to resume active operations. Unless Grant does something quickly, he will very likely be set aside. He is no longer the idol of the people, and those who defend his failures only do so with the avowed object of damaging Mr. Lincoln. It is indeed highly probable that Grant would ere this have been denounced and superseded if his nonsuccess had not afforded political parties an opening for attacking Mr. Lincoln.

There were rumours in New York of 'a new Confederate invasion of Maryland.' A force, estimated at 5,000 men, was said to have recrossed the Potomac about fifteen miles above Harper's Ferry. These rumours may originate in the report that the Confederates told the people of Maryland that they would take their booty home and then return to fight; or perhaps there was some truth in this story. However that may be, the alarm and panic are genuine; and, no matter how badly Grant wants troops, we may be sure that henceforth the Federal authorities will retain an army in the neighbourhood and for the defence of Washington.

There has been some fighting before Charleston. The following is an official report of the earlier operations:—

Charleston: July 4, 1864.

General S. Cooper, Adjutant and Inspector-General:

On the morning of the 3rd instant the enemy landed several regiments on the south side of James Island, supported by two monitors and several gunboats in the Stono, and, after a sharp skirmish, captured two pieces of artillery and commenced entrenching.

At the same time several gunboats and transports with troops came up the North Edisto. At early dawn yesterday from seven hundred to a thousand men on barges attacked Fort Johnston, and were handsomely and thoroughly repulsed, with a loss to the enemy of one hundred and forty prisoners, with their arms and accoutrements, and five barges. Many were killed and wounded. Our loss very slight.

The enemy on the south end of James Island fell back hastily yesterday, before our men, leaving their dead unburied.

Our picket line is reestablished, but the monitors and gunboats are still in the Stono firing heavily on our lines, and another transport has just come in with troops.

The party from North Edisto landed at White Point, and advanced, but were soon met and driven back.

So far the enemy has been repulsed with the loss of about six hundred men.

Samuel Jones, Major-General.

On the 8th there was fighting on John's Island, and, according to Federal accounts, the Confederates were repulsed. On the 9th the Confederates renewed the attack, and surprised and defeated the 104th Pennsylvania Regiment. The Federals were reinforced and recovered their position. According to the latest advices, viâ New York, Confederate despatches assert that the Federals have been driven from John's and James Islands to Morris Island, that the gunboats in the Stono have been driven out of range, and that one monitor has been seriously damaged.

Amongst the war rumours of the week are the defeat and death of General Forrest; a drawn battle in Mississippi between the Federals under General A. J. Smith, and the Confederates under General S. D. Lee; that the Confederates are active in Kentucky; that the Confederates are operating in Missouri under General Thornton, where they have captured Marvin and threaten Plattsburg and Fort Scott; and that the Confederates are in considerable force on the Atchafalaya River, nine miles west of Morganzia, Louisiana, which General Candy is fortifying as a base of supplies. The rumour about General Forrest was generally discredited, and is not confirmed by later news.

President Lincoln, on July 18, called 'for 500,000 volunteers for the military service,' and if the volunteers will not come he orders a draft on September 5. According to the statement in the New York World, which we elsewhere republish, Mr. Lincoln has called out 2,408,846 men, and deducting the militia and three-months men, it leaves a balance of 1,910,961, 'exclusive of the temporarily serving militia, of the black soldiers, and of the hundred-day men who recently offered their services.'

There appears to be some difficulty in construing the proclamation. Mr. Lincoln writes: 'Provided, nevertheless, that all credits which may be established under section 8 of the aforesaid Act on account of persons who have entered the naval service during the present rebellion, and by credits for men furnished to the military service in excess of calls heretofore made for volunteers, will be accepted under this call for one, two, or three years, as they may elect, and will be entitled to the bounty provided by the law for the period of service for which they enlist.' New York has raised 3,000 three-years' men in anticipation of the next draft. Are these to stand for 9,000 men in the last call? Again, Mr. Lincoln has lately made a call for 12,000 troops from New York for 100 days' service. Are they to be counted? The New York Journal of Commerce remarks: 'Several regiments are nearly ready to leave, and (unless the present orders are countermanded) all will be in the field within a fortnight. Are these men not to be counted on the local quotas too? They should be counted at the rate of (nearly) three men for every one man of one year's class. We trust that the Governor will see that justice is done to the people of the State in this regard. "Business is business." Nothing can be more businesslike than the President's proclamation. There is no allusion to patriotism, not a word of friendly appeal, not an encouraging syllable about the future, from one end to the other of it.' The Northern journals express considerable doubt as to the 500,000 troops being obtained either by volunteering or by drafting.
